[17] God wot, we shuffle in for a bung i.e., God knows we get into position in an underhand or shifty manner ("shuffle in") in order to steal a purse ("bung").

[18] smoke discover.

pose our stomach[1] stand against it to foist, yet who can better play the staul or the shadow than we, for in a thrust or throng if we shove hard who is he that will not favour a woman, and in giving place to us give you free passage for his purse. Again, in the market, when every wife hath almost her hand on her bung, and that they cry "Beware the cutpurse and cony-catchers," then I—as fast as the best, with my hand-basket as mannerly as if I were to buy great store of butter and eggs for provision of my house—do exclaim against them with my hand on my purse, and say, "The world is bad when a woman cannot walk safely to market for fear of these villainous cutpurses," whenas the first bung I come to, I either nip or foist, or else staul another while he hath stroken, dispatched[2] and gone.

Now, I pray you, gentle sir, wherein are we inferior to you in foisting? And yet this is nothing to the purpose, for it is one of our most simplest shifts.[3] But yet I pray you, what think you: when a farmer, gentleman, or citizen come to the term,[4] perhaps he is wary of his purse, and watch him never so warily, yet he will never be brought to the blow. Is it not possible for us to pinch him[5] ere he pass? He that is most chary of his crowns abroad and will cry "Ware the cony-catchers" will not be afraid to drink a pint of wine with a pretty wench, and perhaps go to a trugging house[6] to ferry out one for his purpose. Then with what cunning we can feed the simple fop,[7] with what fair words, sweet kisses, feigned sighs, as if at that instant we fell in love with him that we never saw before. If we meet him in an evening in the street, if the farmer or other whatsoever be not so forward as to motion some courtesy to us, we straight insinuate into his company, and claim acquaintance of him by some means or other, and if his mind be set for lust, and the Devil drive him on to match himself with some dishonest wanton, then let him look to his purse, for if he do but kiss me in the street, I'll have his purse for a farewell, although he never commit any other act at all. I speak not this only by myself, Laurence, for there be a hundred in London more cunning than myself in this kind of cunny-catching.[8] But if he come into a house, then let our trade alone to verse upon[9] him, for first we feign ourselves hungry, for the benefit of the house, although our bellies were never so full, and no doubt the good pander or bawd she comes forth like a sober matron, and sets store of cates[10] on the table, and then I fall aboard on them,[11] and though I can eat little, yet I make havoc of all,[12] and let him be sure every dish is well sauced, for he shall pay for a pipping pie[13] that cost in the market four pence, at one of the trugging houses eighteen pence. Tush, what is dainty if it be not dear bought? And yet he must come off for crowns besides, and when I see him draw to his purse, I note the putting up of it well, and ere we part, that world goes hard if I foist him not of all that he hath. And then suppose the worst, that he miss it, am I so simply acquainted or badly provided that I have not a friend which, with a few terrible oaths and countenance set, as if he were the proudest soldado that ever bore arms against Don John of Austria,[14] will face him quite out of his money,[15] and make him walk like a woodcock homeward by

---

1 stomach temper; disposition.

2 stroken struck; dispatched executed (the crime) speedily.

3 shifts stratagems; tricks.

4 term refers to each of the periods (usually three or four in the year) appointed for the sitting of certain courts of law. During term time, London would see an influx of people involved in legal proceedings.

5 pinch him rob him.

6 trugging house whore-house, brothel.

7 fop fool.

8 cunny-catching cony-catching; the indecent implication may be strengthened here through the spelling, since "cunny" was slang for the female genitalia (Dict. Slang).

9 verse upon impose upon, swindle.

10 cates choice dainties; delicacies.

11 fall aboard on them attack, fall upon them.

12 make havoc of all tear all (the cates) to pieces.

13 pipping pie pippin pie: apple pie.

14 soldado soldier; Don John of Austria (1545-78) Spanish general and admiral. Famed in the period as a hero over Islamic nations, he defeated the Turkish navy at Lepanto in 1571 and conquered Tunis (North Africa) in 1573.

15 face him quite out of his money i.e., force him to surrender his cash through assuming an attitude of bold-faced, cool confidence.

weeping cross,[1] and so buy repentance with all the crowns in his purse?

[...]

NAN: Alas, good Laurence, thou art no logician. Thou canst not reason for thyself, nor hast no witty arguments to draw me to an exigent,[2] and therefore give me leave at large to reason for this supper. Remember, the subject of our disputation is this positive[3] question: whether whores or thieves are most prejudicial to the commonwealth. Alas, you poor thieves do only steal and purloin[4] from men, and the harm you do is to imbolish[5] men's goods and bring them to poverty; this is the only end[6] of men's thievery and the greatest prejudice that grows from robbing or filching. So much do we by our theft, and more by our lechery, for what is the end of whoredom but consuming of goods and beggary? And besides perpetual infamy, we bring young youths to ruin and utter destruction. I pray you, Laurence, whether had a merchant's son (having wealthy parents) better light upon a whore than a cutpurse, the one only taking his money, the other bringing him to utter confusion.[7] For if the foist light upon him or the cony-catcher, he loseth at the most some hundred pounds, but if he fall into the company of a whore, she flatters him, she inveigles him, she bewitcheth him, that he spareth neither goods nor lands to content her that is only in love with his coin. If he be married, he forsakes his wife, leaves his children, despiseth his friends, only to satisfy his lust with the love of a base whore, who when he hath spent all upon her and he brought to beggary beateth him out like the prodigal child,[8] and for a small reward brings him if to the fairest end to beg, if to the second to the gallows, or at the last and worst to the pox or as prejudicial diseases. I pray you, Laurence, when any of you come to your confession at Tyburn,[9] what is your last sermon that you make? That you were brought to that wicked and shameful end by following of harlots, for to that end do you steal to maintain whores, and to content their bad humours. Oh, Laurence, enter into your own thoughts, and think what the fair words of a wanton will do, what the smiles of a strumpet will drive a man to act, into what jeopardy a man will thrust himself for her that he loves, although for his sweet villainy he be brought to loathsome leprosy. Tush, Laurence, they say the pox came from Naples, some from Spain, some from France, but wheresoever it first grew, it is so surely now rooted in England that by S. (Syth)[10] it may better be called a morbus Anglicus than Gallicus,[11] and I hope you will grant all these French favours grew from whores. Besides, in my high loving or rather creeping, I mean where men and women do rob together, there always the woman is most bloody, for she always urgeth unto death, and though the men would only satisfy themselves with the parties' coin, yet she endeth her theft in blood, murdering parties so deeply as [1] walk like a woodcock homeward by weeping cross The proverbial phrase "to come home by Weeping Cross" means "to suffer grievous disappointment or failure." The woodcock was notorious for the ease with which it was captured in a snare or net; thus, it became the type of gullibility or folly, and an image of the simpleton or dupe.

[2] to an exigent to the critical point (where I will need to urgently and immediately respond).

[3] positive precise.

[4] purloin steal, rob.

[5] imbolish make away with; take.

[6] only end sole result.

[7] confusion ruin, destruction.

[8] See p. 1012, note 10.

[9] Until 1783, public executions took place near to London at Tyburn, Middlesex. Traditionally the condemned were allowed to make a speech before they were executed; these often, but not always, took the form of repentant confessions.

[10] S. (Syth) perhaps, St Sithney (also known as Sezni), an ancient Cornish saint. When God made Sithney the patron saint of girls, he begged for some other sphere of responsibility since he anticipated being constantly bothered by prayers for husbands and finery. Offered the care of mad dogs instead, the saint reportedly said, "I'd rather have mad dogs than women any day" (Dict. Saints); or perhaps St Osyth or Osith, an early English saint (died c. 700 CE), popular throughout the Middle Ages and the early sixteenth century. Ordained by God for a life of virginity even after her marriage to Sighere, king of the East Saxons, Osith took a vow of chastity and founded a nunnery. Martyred by pirates, she carried her own severed head to a nearby church where she was buried (Dict. Saints).

[11] Latin, "an English disease" than "[a] Gallic [or French one]."

she is malicious. I hope, gentle Laurence, you cannot contradict these reasons, they be so openly, manifestly probable. For mine own part, I hope you do not imagine but I have had some friends[1] besides poor George, my husband; alas, he knows it, and is content like an honest, simple suffragan[2] to be co-rival with a number of other good companions, and I have made many a good man, I mean a man that hath a household, for the love of me to go home and beat his poor wife, when, God wot, I mock him for the money he spent, and he had nothing for his pence but the waste beleavings[3] of others' beastly labours. Laurence, Laurence, if concubines could inveigle Solomon, if Dalilah could betray Sampson,[4] then wonder not if we, more nice[5] in our wickedness than a thousand such Dalilahs, can seduce poor, young novices to their utter destructions. Search the jails, there you shall hear complaints of whores; look into the spitals and hospitals,[6] there you shall see men diseased of the French marbles,[7] giving instruction to others that are said to beware of whores; be an auditor or ear witness at the death of any thief, and his last testament is, "Take heed of a whore." I dare scarce speak of Bridewell,[8] because my shoulders tremble at the name of it, I have so often deserved it. Yet look but in there, and you shall hear poor men with their hands in their piggen-holes[9] cry, "Oh, fie upon whores," when Fowler gives them the terrible lash;[10] examine beggars that lie lame by the highway, and they say they came to that misery by whores; some threadbare citizens that from merchants and other good trades grow to be base informers and Knights of the Post,[11] cry out when they dine with Duke Humphrey,[12] "Oh, what wickedness comes from whores!" Prentices that runs from their masters cries out upon whores. Tush, Laurence, what enormities proceeds more in the commonwealth than from whoredom? But sith 'tis almost suppertime, and mirth is the friend to digestion, I mean a little to be pleasant. I pray you, how many bad profits again grows from whores? Bridewell would have very few tenants, the hospital would want patients, and the surgeons much work; the apothecaries would have surfling water[13] and potato roots lie dead on their hands, the painters could not dispatch and make away their vermillion, if tallow-faced whores used it not for their cheeks. How should Sir John's broadsmen[14] do, if

[1] friends lovers.

[2] suffragan a coadjutor, assistant.

[3] beleavings left-overs.

[4] concubines … Solomon Solomon, beloved of God, son of King David, was famed for his wisdom, yet he lost God's favour when his foreign wives "turned away his heart after other gods" (1 Kings 11:4). In his anger at Solomon's apostasy, God takes Israel away from Solomon's heirs. See 1 Kings 11-12; Dalilah … Sampson Sampson, an early Israelite hero, possessed of more-than-human strength, had many victories over the Philistines, until, seduced by the beautiful Philistine woman, Delilah, he revealed the secret of his strength: as long as he did not cut his hair his strength remained; once it was cut, his strength would leave him. Delilah betrayed his secret: the Philistines cut his hair and gouged out his eyes (Judges 13-16).

[5] nice particular, careful.

[6] spital a charitable institution for the housing and care of the indigent or diseased; sometimes, specifically, a lazar-house (a place for the treatment of lepers). Hospitals were generally distinguished from spitals as serving people of a higher class.

[7] French marbles syphilis.

[8] Bridewell a house of correction for prisoners; a place of forced labour. According to Stowe, the building was given to the city of London "to be a workhouse for the poor and idle persons of the city" (Survey London, 2.45).

[9] piggen-holes pigeon-holes, thieves' cant for the stocks; also for the similar instrument in which the hands of culprits were confined, when being flogged.

[10] when Fowler gives them the terrible lash Fowler was clearly an officer or jailer at Bridewell. Whipping was a particularly common punishment for prostitution and lechery in the period.

[11] Knight of the Post i.e., of the whipping post or pillory; a notorious perjurer; one who gets his living by giving false evidence.

[12] "To dine with Duke Humphrey" means to go without one's dinner. The origin of the saying is obscure, but see Kingswell's note in his edition of Stowe's Survey of London, 2.348-9.

[13] apothecary one who prepared and sold compounds for medicinal purposes; surfling water a type of face-wash, which (according to Gilbert Walker) was used to make a young but seasoned prostitute appear to be a virgin in order to increase her price. Apparently this "sweet-water" could draw together and tighten the skin and muscles to which it was applied. See A Manifest Detection of the Most Vile and Detestable Use of Diceplay, and Other Practices Like the Same [1552] in Early English Poetry, Ballads, and Popular Literature of the Middle Ages, ed. J.O. Halliwell, vol. 29 (London, 1851), pp. 35-36.

[14] Sir John's broadsmen The reference here is obscure. "Sir John" was a familiar or contemptuous appellation for a priest or cleric; while "broadsman" means "one who lives near the Norfolk Broads"; the

we were not? Why, Laurence, the Galley would be moored, and the Blue Boar so lean that he would not be man's meat, if we of the trade were not to supply his wants. Do you think in conscience the Peacock could burnish his fair tail, were it not the Whore of Babylon and such like makes him lusty with crowns?[1] No, no, though the talbot hath bitten some at the game, yet new, fresh huntsmen shake the she-crew out of the couples.[2] What should I say more, Laurence? The suburbs should have a great miss of us, and Shoreditch would complain to Dame Anne a Cleare[3] if we of the sisterhood should not uphold her jollity.

[...]

Thus, countrymen, you have heard the disputation between these two cozening companions, wherein I have shaked out[4] the notable villainy of whores, although Mistress Nan, this good oratress,[5] hath sworn to wear a long Hamburg knife to stab me, and all the crew have protested[6] my death; and to prove they meant good earnest, they beleaguered[7] me about in the Saint John's Head within Ludgate[8] being at supper. There were some fourteen or fifteen of them met, and thought to have made that the fatal night of my overthrow, but that the courteous citizens and apprentices took my part, and so two or three of them were carried to the Counter,[9] although a gentleman in my company was sore[10] hurt. I cannot deny but they begin to waste away about London, and Tyburn (since the setting out of my book) hath eaten up many of them; and I will plague them to the extremity, let them do what they dare with their bilboa blades,[11] I fear them not. And to give them their last adieu, look shortly, countrymen, for a pamphlet against them word's meaning as "cardsharper" dates to the late-nineteenth century, and thus doesn't apply here. The Norfolk Broads is an area in the county of Norfolk, on the east coast of England. Greene himself was born in Norwich, Norfolk, so perhaps there is a sly dig here at the author himself. Even if "Sir" is perhaps a printer's error for "St" the reference is murky, although Greene himself attended St John's College, Cambridge, taking his degree there in 1578.

1 Given the tenor of Nan's argument (i.e., the economic importance of prostitution), it is likely that each of these is an inn, tavern, or alehouse, many of which were centres for such activity. The Galley has not been traced. However, there was a Blue Boar Inn in Spitalfields, London, and also a tavern by this name outside Aldgate (Topographical Dict., p. 65). The Peacock was a London tavern (in Aldersgate Street), but Greene also refers here to London generally as a beautiful creature of vanity, whose prosperity and ability to indulge in luxury would be impossible without the economic engine of prostitution. A common English appellation that expressed Protestant horror of and contempt for the Roman Catholic Church generally and the Pope in particular, "the Whore of Babylon" has a more direct application here. She is an allegorical figure from the Book of Revelation who represents the pride, idolatry, and moral/sexual corruption of ancient pagan Rome. Green compares prostitutes and prostitution to the biblical Whore's insatiable lust (sexual, monetary, and homicidal), and its apocalyptically destructive effects on the nations who succumb to her, as well as on the righteous who resist her. Richly dressed, she holds "a golden cup full of abomination" and is "drunk with the blood of the martyrs" (17.4-6). Those "kings of the earth, who committed fornication and were wanton with her" grieve over her eventual destruction, and are sentenced to eternal damnation.

2 talbot name of a variety of hound, used for tracking and hunting, with great powers of scent; she-crew where "crew" means "mob or gang of criminals"; the couples a brace or leash for holding two hounds together; usually in plural.

3 The suburbs ... Shoreditch ... Anne a Cleare The suburbs of London were notorious for their brothels, taverns, bear-baiting pits, and playhouses. Shoreditch was a district in NE London, the home of the earliest London playhouses, the Theatre and the Curtain, an area which was infamous for its prostitutes and criminals (Topographical Dict., p. 465); Anne a Cleare or Annis a Cleare was the widow of a London alderman, who married "a riotous courtier." He "consumed all her wealth" and left her in poverty (R. Johnson, The Pleasant Walks of Moor-fields [1607]). In desperation, she drowned herself in the spring which bears her name, located in Hogsdon (Hoxton), a suburb near Shoreditch. The spring became in the seventeenth century a popular place for public bathing (Topographical Dict., p. 20.). A largely rural district to which Londoners would resort during holidays, Hogsdon was, like Shoreditch, notorious for its prostitutes.

4 shaked out shaken or shook out: revealed.

5 oratress a female orator.

6 protested vowed or promised solemnly.

7 beleaguered surrounded, beset.

8 Saint John's Head was a tavern located inside of Ludgate, one of the old gates of the walled city of London (Topographical Dict., pp. 321-22).

9 the Counter London debtors' prison associated with the City Court; there were two counters in London proper: the Poultry Counter and the Bread Street Counter, each named after the street it stood on; but there were others in London's various suburbs (Topographical Dict., p. 133).

10 sore seriously, grievously.

11 bilboa blade an excellent kind of sword, noted for the temper and elasticity of its blade.

called The Black Book,[1] containing four new laws never spoken of yet: the creeping law of petty thieves, that rob about the suburbs; the lymitting law, discoursing the orders of such as follow judges in their circuits, and go about from fair to fair; the jugging law, wherein I will set out the disorders at nine-holes and ryfling,[2] how they are only for the benefit of the cutpurses; the stripping law, wherein I will lay open the lewd abuses of sundry jailors in England. Beside, you shall see there what houses there be about the suburbs and town's end that are receivers of cutpurses' stolen goods, lifts,[3] and such like. And lastly, look for a bed-roll or catalogue of all the names of the foists, nips, lifts, and priggers[4] in and about London.[5] And although some say I dare not do it, yet I will shortly set it abroach,[6] and whosoever I name or touch, if he think himself grieved, I will answer him before the honourable Privy Council.[7]

The Conversion of an English Courtesan.

Sith to discover my parentage would double the grief of my living parents and revive in them the memory of my great amiss, and that my untoward fall would be a dishonour to the house from whence I came; sith to manifest the place of my birth would be a blemish (through my beastly life so badly misled) to the shire where I was born; sith to discourse my name might be holden a blot in my kindred's brow, to have a sinew in their stock of so little grace: I will conceal my parents, kin, and country,[8] and shroud my name with silence, lest envy might taunt others for my wantonness. Know, therefore, I was born about threescore[9] miles from London, of honest and wealthy parents, who had many children, but I their only daughter, and therefore the jewel wherein they most delighted, and more, the youngest of all, and therefore the more favoured. For being gotten in the waning of my parent's age, they doted on me above the rest, and so set their hearts the more on fire. I was the fairest of all, and yet not more beautiful than I was witty, in so much that, being a pretty parrot,[10] I had such quaint conceits[11] and witty words in my mouth, that the neighbours said, "I was too soon wise, to be long old."[12] Would to God either the proverb had been authentical, or their sayings prophecies: then had I by death in my nonage[13] buried many blemishes that my riper years brought me to. For the extreme love of my parents was the very efficient cause[14] of my follies, resembling herein the nature of the ape, that ever killeth that young one which he loveth most, with embracing it too fervently.[15] So my father and mother, but she most of all, although he too much, so cockered me up[16] in my wantonness that my wit grew to the worst, and

---

1 Greene's The Black Book's Messenger (1592).

2 nine-holes a game in which the players endeavour to roll small balls into nine holes made in the ground, each hole having a separate scoring value; ryfling dicing (Partridge, "jugging law," Dict. Slang).

3 lifts goods stolen from shops.

4 priggers thieves.

5 There is no such list in The Black Book's Messenger.

6 set it abroach publish or diffuse it.

7 Privy Council England's governing body for much of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, the Privy Council was presided over by the monarch and comprised of ministers of state and officers of the monarch's household. The Council did function as a legal court, particularly in its guise as court of Star Chamber, which dealt with cases involving "breaches of the king's peace," "interference with royal justice," as well as civil cases. After 1558, however, the Star Chamber also dealt with "the new crime of seditious libel" (R.B. Manning, "Star Chamber, Court of," Hist. Dict. Tudor England).

8 country county, area of the country.

9 threescore sixty.

10 parrot applied contemptuously to a person who mechanically repeats the speech or imitates the actions of others.

11 quaint clever, smart; conceits fanciful or witty notions.

12 I … old Cf. "He that would be old long (well old) must be old betimes (Old young and old long)" (Tilley O34).

13 in my nonage i.e., in my minority; before I became a legal adult.

14 efficient cause one which makes effects to be what they are.

15 nature of the ape … fervently "The she apes of all sorts are wondrous fond of their little ones: and such as are made tame within house will carry them in their arms all about so soon as they have brought them into the world, keep a-showing of them to everybody, and they take pleasure to have them dandled by others, as if thereby they took knowledge that folk joyed for their safe deliverance: but such a culling [i.e., fondling] and hugging of them they keep that in the end with very clasping and clipping [i.e., embracing] they kill them many times" (Pliny, Natural History, 1.231).

16 cockered me up raised me indulgently, humouring rather than correcting my faults.

I waxed[1] upward with the ill weeds. Whatsoever I did, were it never so bad, might not be found fault withal; my father would smile at it and say, "'twas but the trick of a child," and my mother allowed of my unhappy parts,[2] alluding to this profane and old proverb, "An untoward girl makes a good woman."

But now I find, in sparing the rod, they hated the child,[3] that over-kind fathers make unruly daughters. Had they bent the wand while it had been green, it would have been pliant,[4] but I, ill grown in my years, am almost remediless. The hawk that is most perfect for the flight will seldom proveth haggard,[5] and children that are virtuously nurtured in youth will be honestly natured in age. Fie upon[6] such as say, "Young saints, old devils"; it is no doubt a devilish and damnable saying, for what is not bent in the cradle will hardly be bowed in the saddle.[7] Myself am an instance, who after I grew to be six years old was set to school, where I profited so much that I writ and read excellently well, played upon the virginals, lute, and citron, and could sing prick-song[8] at the first sight: insomuch as by that time I was twelve years old, I was holden for the most fair and best qualitied young girl in all that country, but with this, bewailed of my well-wishers, in that my parents suffered[9] me to be so wanton.

[...]

But I, whom wanton desires had drawn in delight, still presumed in my former follies, and gave myself either to gad abroad,[10] or else at home to read dissolute pamphlets, which bred in me many ill-affected wishes, so that I gave leave to love and lust to enter into the centre of my heart, where they harboured till they wrought my final and fatal prejudice.[11]

Thus leading my life loosely,[12] and being soothed up with the applause of my too kind and loving parents, I had many of every degree that made love unto me, as well for my beauty as for the hope of wealth that my father would bestow upon me. Sundry suitors I had, and I allowed of all, though I particularly granted love to none, yielding them friendly favours, as being proud I had more wooers than any maid in the parish beside. Amongst the rest there was a wealthy farmer that wished me well, a man of some forty years of age, one too worthy for one of so little worth as myself, and him my father, mother, and other friends would have had me match myself withal. But I, that had had the reins of liberty too long in mine own hands, refused him and would not be ruled by their persuasions; and though my mother with tears entreated me to consider of mine own estate, and how well I sped[13] if I wedded with him, yet carelessly I despised her counsel, and flatly made answer that I would none of him, which though it pinched my parents at the quick, yet rather than they would displease me, they left me in mine own liberty to love. Many there were beside him, men's sons of no mean worth, that were wooers unto me, but in vain. Either my fortune or destiny drove me to a worser end, for I refused them all, and with the beetle, refusing to light on the sweetest flowers all day, nestled at night in a cowsheard.[14]

---

[1] waxed grew.

[2] allowed of my unhappy parts i.e., sanctioned my bad qualities.

[3] Proverb, "Spare the rod and spoil (spill) the child" (i.e., he that spares the rod hates the child) (Proverbs 13:24; Tilley R155).

[4] Proverb: "Thraw [i.e., twist] the wand while it is green" (Tilley W27); see the related proverbs, T632, W136.

[5] haggard wild or intractable; a "hag" is a wild female hawk caught when in her adult plumage and thus very difficult to tame and train.

[6] Fie upon "shame upon"; in early use, an exclamation expressing disgust or indignant reproach. Proverb: "young saints, old devils" (Tilley S33).

[7] Proverb, "Foul (fair) in the cradle, fair (foul) in the saddle [i.e., in adulthood]" (Tilley C792).

[8] virginal a keyed musical instrument common in England in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, resembling a spinet; citron a cithern, an instrument like a guitar, but strung with wire and played with a plectrum or quill; prick-song i.e., "pricked song": music sung from written ("pricked") vocal music.

[9] suffered allowed, permitted.

[10] gad abroad wander or rove about idly.

[11] prejudice destruction, ruin, overthrow. Cf. Vives's representation of the morally corrupting effect of romance-reading on women (pp. 106-08).

[12] loosely licentiously, dissolutely.

[13] sped succeeded, prospered.

[14] cowsheard cow-shard: cow-dung; a cow turd.

It fortuned that as many sought to win me, so amongst the rest there was an odd[1] companion that dwelt with a gentleman hard by,[2] a fellow of small reputation, and of no living,[3] neither had he any excellent qualities but thrumming on the gittron,[4] but of pleasant disposition he was, and could gawl out many quaint and ribaldrous jigs and songs, and so was favoured of the foolish sect for his foppery.[5] This shifting companion,[6] suitable to myself in vanity, would oft times be jesting with me, and I so long dallying with him, that I began deeply (oh, let me blush at this confession) to fall in love with him, and so construed of all his actions, that I consented to mine own overthrow: for as smoke will hardly be concealed, so love will not be long smothered,[7] but will bewray her own secrets, which was manifest in me, who in my sporting with him, so bewrayed my affection, that he spying I favoured him, began to strike when the iron was hot,[8] and to take opportunity by the forehead;[9] and one day finding me in a merry vein, began to question with me of love, which although at the first I slenderly[10] denied him, yet at last I granted, so that not only I agreed to plight him my faith,[11] but that night—meeting to have farther talk—I lasciviously consented that he cropped the flower of my virginity.[12] When thus I was spoiled by such a base companion, I gave myself to content his humour, and to satisfy the sweet of mine own wanton desires. Oh, here let me breathe and with tears bewail the beginning of my miseries, and to exclaim against the folly of my parents, who by too much favouring me in my vanity in my tender youth laid the first plot[13] of my ensuing repentance. Had they with due correction chastised my wantonness, and suppressed my foolish will with their grave advice, they had made me more virtuous and themselves less sorrowful. A father's frown is a bridle to the child, and a mother's check is a stay to the stubborn daughter.[14] Oh, had my parents in over-loving me not hated me, I had not at this time cause to complain! Oh, had my father regarded the saying of the wise man, I had not been thus woebegone!

[...]

[The English Courtesan's lover, having stolen her away, returns to her birthplace in order to ascertain whether the lovers have any hope of receiving the approval of her father for their marriage. Having been left in an inn, the Courtesan attracts the attention of many men. One in particular, a gentleman whom the Courtesan soon begins to call her "supposed husband," woos her with sonnets and jewels, and in a short while they are frequent bed companions. He carries her off to Bath, with her enthusiastic consent. In Bath, her supposed husband gathers about him a company of young gentlemen. The Courtesan falls in love with her supposed husband's best friend, and he

[1] odd single (perhaps, also, "eccentric" or "different").

[2] hard by close by, very near.

[3] living livelihood, maintenance; perhaps, property in general, especially landed estate.

[4] gittron gittern: a type of guitar; a cithern.

[5] gawl to bawl out; quaint clever; ribaldrous ribald; wanton, licentious; foppery folly.

[6] shifting companion changeable companion; given that he has no means of livelihood, perhaps more specifically, one who practises or lives by fraud, or temporary expedients.

[7] Proverb, "Love and a cough (smoke, itch) cannot be hid" (Tilley L490).

[8] Proverb, "It is good to strike while the iron is hot" (Tilley I94); that is, one should make one's effort while circumstances are favourable.

[9] Proverb, "Take time (occasion) by the forelock, for she is bald behind" (Tilley T311), meaning that opportunity should be seized upon immediately the moment it presents itself, because once passed it cannot be grasped. There are many variations.

[10] slenderly perfunctorily.

[11] plight him my faith i.e., to pledge or promise him my allegiance or constancy.

[12] cropped the flower of my virginity a common image for defloration; the hymen is often represented as a flower. See, for example, Helkiah Crooke, Microcosmographia, 1615, p. 223.

[13] plot plan, design.

[14] A father's frown … daughter not in Tilley, although there are a number of related proverbs having to do with parental discipline, such as "Better children weep than old men" (i.e., "Better you make your children cry with seasonable correction, than they make you cry by their after miscarriage") [Tilley C326]; and "He that cockers [i.e., indulges] his child provides for his enemy" (Tilley C308); stay a cause of stoppage; a hindrance; check reprimand, rebuke.

with her. They carry on their affair so openly that it is soon no secret to the Courtesan's supposed husband and his other friends. During a debate at dinner concerning whether a woman might have a second lover and whether any man should bear such a situation, the Courtesan's supposed husband tells a story about a woman who has an affair with her husband's best friend, but who is reformed through the husband's efforts. The effect of the tale is immediate. The Courtesan finds herself rejected by the best friend; his conscience having been touched by the tale, he tries to persuade her to be faithful to her supposed husband.]

[...] much good counsel he gave me, but all in vain, for I scorned it, and began to hate him, and resolved both to be rid of him and my supposed husband, for falling in [with] another familiar of my husband's, I so inveigled him with sweet words that I caused him to make a piece of money to steal me away, and so carry me to London, where I had not lived long with him ere he, seeing my light behaviour, left me to the world, and to shift for myself.[1] Here by my example may you note the inconstant life of courtesans and common harlots, who after they have lost their honesty care not who grow into their favour, nor what villainy they commit. They fancy all as long as crowns[2] last, and only aim at pleasure and ease. They cleave like caterpillars to the tree, and consume the fruit where they fall. They be vultures that prey on men alive, and like the serpent sting the bosom wherein they are nourished.[3] I may best discourse their nature, because I was one of their profession, but now being metamorphosed I hold it meritorious for me to warn women from being such wantons, and to give a caveat to men, lest they addict themselves to such straggling[4] strumpets, as love none, though they like all, but affectionate only for profit, and when he hath spent all, they beat him out of doors with the prodigal child.[5] But stopping here, till occasion serve me fitter to discover the manner of courtesans, to myself,[6] who now being brought to London, and left here at random, was not such a house-dove[7] while any friend stayed with me, but that I had visited some houses in London that could harbour as honest a woman as myself. Whenas, therefore, I was left to myself, I removed my lodging, and got me into one of those houses of good hospitality whereunto persons resort, commonly called a trugging house, or to be plain, a whorehouse, where I gave myself to entertain all companions, sitting or standing at the door like a staul[8] to allure or draw in wanton passengers, refusing none that would with his purse purchase me to be his, to satisfy the disordinate desire of his filthy lust. Now I began not to respect personage,[9] good qualities, to the gracious favour of the man, when eye had no respect of person, for the oldest lecher was as welcome as the youngest lover so he brought meat in his mouth;[10] otherwise I pronounce against him,

Si nihil attuleris ibis Homere foras.[11]

I waxed[12] thus in this hell of voluptuousness daily worse and worse, yet having, as they term it, a

---

1 light wanton, unchaste; to shift for myself to provide for my own livelihood (implying either absence of aid, or, sometimes, want of concern from others).

2 crowns money (a crown was a coin worth about five shillings).

3 See Aesop's fable, "The Ploughman and the Frozen Snake." A ploughman, finding a snake half-dead from freezing, places it under his shirt to warm up. When the snake recovers, it bites and kills the ploughman. The fable's moral is that a bad nature is not altered by the effects of kindness.

4 straggling wandering, roving, vagrant; by extension, morally wandering or inconstant.

5 For the parable of the prodigal son, see p. 1012, note 10.

6 to myself i.e., (I) return to the subject of myself.

7 house-dove a stay-at-home, with the image of the dove implying virtue and chastity.

8 staul decoy-bird, lure.

9 personage personal appearance.

10 brought meat in his mouth "to carry meat in one's (or the) mouth": to bring in money, be a source of profit, perhaps originally said of hawks, taught to hunt small game and (instead of eating their kill) to carry it back to their trainers.

11 Latin, "If you bring nothing, you'll be going right out the doors, Homer" (Ovid, Art of Love, 2.279-80). The full verse lines say that even if Homer himself were to visit a beloved, bringing with him all the Muses, if he came carrying no gift, he'd be quickly shown the door.

12 waxed grew.

respect to the main chance,[1] as near as I could to avoid diseases, and to keep myself brave in apparel, although I paid a kind of tribute to the bawd,[2] according as the number and benefit of my companions did exceed. But never could I be brought to be a pickpocket or thievish by any of their persuasions—although I wanted[3] daily no instructions to allure me to that villainy—for I think nature had wrought in me a contrary humour,[4] otherwise my bad nurture and conversing with such bad company had brought me to it. Marry,[5] in all their vices I carried a brazen face[6] and was shameless, for what ruffian[7] was there in London that would utter more desperate oaths than I in mine anger, what to spit, quaff, or carouse[8] more devilishly or rather damnably than myself? And for beastly communication, Messalina of Rome[9] might have been waiting maid. Besides I grew so grafted in sin that consueto peccandi tollebat sensum peccati ("custom of sin, took away the feeling of the sin")—for I so accustomably use myself to all kind of vice that I accounted swearing no sin; whoredom, why I smile at that, and could profanely say that it was a sin which God laughed at; gluttony I held good fellowship, and wrath, honour and resolution—I despised God; nay, in my conscience I might easily have been persuaded there was no God. I contemned[10] the preachers, and when any wished me to reform my life, I bad,[11] "Away with the Puritan!" And if any young woman refused to be as vicious every way as myself, I would then say, "Gip, fine soul, a young saint will prove an old devil."[12] I never would go to the church, and sermons I utterly refused, holding them as needless tales told in a pulpit. I would not bend mine ears to the hearing of any good discourse, but still delighted in jangling ditties[13] of ribaldry.

Thus, to the grief of my friends, hazard of my soul, and consuming of my body, I spent a year or two in this base and bad kind of life, subject to the whistle of every desperate ruffian, till on a time, there resorted to our house a clothier,[14] a proper young man, who by fortune coming first to drink, espying me, asked me if I would drink with him. There needed no great entreaty, for as then I wanted company, and so clapped me down[15] by him, and began very pleasantly then to welcome him. The man, being of himself modest and honest, noted my personage, and judicially reasoned of my strumpet-like behaviour, and inwardly, as after he reported unto me, grieved that so foul properties were hidden in so good a proportion, and that such rare wit and excellent beauty was blemished with whoredom's base deformity, insomuch that he began to think well of me, and to wish that I were as honest[16] as I was beautiful. Again, see how God wrought[17] for my conversion: since I gave myself to my loose kind of life, I never liked any so well as him, insomuch that I began to judge of every part, and

[1] respect to the main chance a solicitous regard for one's own interests or gain.

[2] bawd here, the madam, the woman who keeps the place of prostitution.

[3] wanted lacked.

[4] contrary humour a diametrically opposed or different disposition or natural tendency.

[5] Marry interjection: "indeed!" or "to be sure!"

[6] brazen face an unabashed or hardened countenance.

[7] ruffian a man habitually given to acts of violence or crime; a cutthroat villain.

[8] quaff to drink (liquor) deeply and repeatedly; carouse to drink (liquor) deeply and repeatedly, especially to drink toasts.

[9] Messalina of Rome Valeria Messal(l)ina (b. before 20 CE), empress, wife of Claudius, her legendary sexual excesses, such as her reported sexual marathons at a Roman brothel would have been well-known through Juvenal's Satires 6 and 10. Although "communication" meaning sexual intercourse is not a recorded usage in the OED until 1771, it seems clear that this is one of the meanings here, although "conversation" is also meant.

[10] contemned despised, held in contempt.

[11] bad commanded, ordered.

[12] Proverb (Tilley S33). Bp. Hall, Medit & Vows I. § 6. records "that old slander of early holiness: a young saint, an old devil. Sometimes young devils have proved the old saints: never the contrary." This is, of course a version of the proverb which the narrator records her mother quoting (p. 1021, ll. 482-84); Gip an expression of surprise or contempt addressed to a person ("get out!" or "go along with you!").

[13] ditties songs.

[14] clothier one engaged in the cloth trade; a maker of woolen cloth.

[15] clapped me down flung myself down energetically.

[16] honest chaste.

[17] wrought worked, laboured.

methought he was the properest[1] man that ever I saw. Thus we sat both amorous of other, I lasciviously, and he honestly. At last he questioned with me what country woman I was, and why being so proper a woman I would beseem to dwell or lie in a base alehouse, especially in one that had a bad name. I warrant you he wanted no knavish reply to fit him, for I told him the house was as honest as his mother's. Marry, if there were in it a good wench or two that would pleasure their friends at a need, I guess by his nose what porridge he loved,[2] and that he hated none such. Well, seeing me in that voice he said little, but shaked his head, paid for the beer and went his way, only taking his leave of me with a kiss, which methought was the sweetest that ever was given me. As soon as he was gone, I began to think what a handsome man he was, and wished that he would come and take a night's lodging with me, sitting in a dump to think of the quaintness[3] of his personage, till other companions came in that shaked me out of that melancholy, but as soon again as I was secret to myself, he came into my remembrance. Passing over thus a day or two, this clothier came again to our house, whose sight cheered me up, for that spying him out at a casement,[4] I ran down the stairs and met him at the door, and heartily welcomed him, and asked him if he would drink.

"I come for that purpose," says he, "but I will drink no more below but in a chamber."

"Marry, sir," quoth I, "you shall," and so brought him into the fairest room. In their[5] sitting there together drinking, at last the clothier fell to kissing and other dalliance,[6] wherein he found me not coy,[7] at last told me that he would willingly have his pleasure of me, but the room was too lightsome, for of all things in the world, he could not in such actions away with[8] a light chamber. I consented unto him, and brought him into a room more dark, but still he said it was too light. Then I carried him into a farther chamber, where, drawing a buckram[9] curtain afore the window, and closing the curtains of the bed, I asked him smiling, if that were close[10] enough.

"No, sweet love," says he, "the curtain is thin and not broad enough for the window. Peradventure[11] some watching eye may espy us, my heart misdoubts, and my credit[12] is my life. Good love, if thou hast a more close room than this, bring me to it."

"Why, then," quoth I, "follow me," and with that I brought him into a back loft, where stood a little bed only appointed to lodge suspicious persons,[13] so dark that at noon days it was impossible for any man to see his own hands.

"How now, sir," quoth I, "is not this dark enough?"

He, sitting him down on the bedside, fetched a deep sigh, and said, "Indifferent,[14] so, so, but there is a glimpse of light in at the tiles.[15] Somebody may by fortune see us."

"In faith, no," quoth I, "none but God."

"God?" says he "Why, can God see us here?"

"Good sir," quoth I, "why I hope you are not so simple, but God's eyes are so clear and penetrating that they can pierce through walls of brass, and that were we enclosed never so secretly, yet we are manifestly seen to him."

"And alas," quoth he, "sweet love, if God see us shall we not be more ashamed to do such a filthy act before him than before men? I am sure thou art not so shameless but thou wouldst blush and be afraid to have the meanest commoner in London see thee in the action of thy filthy lust,

---

1 properest most excellent; most handsome.

2 Proverb, "One may know by his nose (looks, face) what pottage (porridge) he loves" (Tilley N227).

3 quaintness beauty or handsomeness.

4 casement window.

5 Greene here slips from first person into third person.

6 dalliance amorous play; caressing.

7 coy shy, reserved, retiring.

8 could not … away with could not endure or tolerate.

9 buckram coarse cloth stiffened with gum or paste.

10 close closed in; concealed, hidden.

11 Peradventure by chance, perhaps.

12 credit reputation.

13 suspicious persons persons suspected of some crime or offence.

14 Indifferent moderately.

15 tiles shingles.

and dost thou not shame more to have God, the maker of all things, see thee, who revengeth sin with death, he whose eyes are clearer than the sun, who is the searcher of the heart, and holdeth vengeance in his hands to punish sinners? Consider, sweet love, that if man and wife would be ashamed to have any of their friends see them in the act of generation, or performing the rites of marriage, which is lawful and allowed before God, yet for modesty do it in the most covert[1] they may, then how impudent or graceless should we be to fulfil our filthy lust before the eyes of the Almighty, who is greater than all kings or princes on the earth? Oh, let us tremble that we but once durst have such wanton communication in the hearing of his divine Majesty, who pronounceth damnation for such as give themselves over to adultery. 'It is not possible,' sayeth the Lord, 'for any whoremaster or lascivious wanton to enter into the kingdom of God.'[2] For such sins whole cities have sunk, kingdoms have been destroyed, and though God suffereth[3] such wicked livers to escape for a while, yet at length he payeth home,[4] in this world with beggary, shame, diseases, or infamy, and in the other life with perpetual damnation. Weigh but the inconvenience[5] that grows through thy loose[6] life: thou art hated of all that are good, despised of the virtuous, and only well thought of, of reprobates, rascals, ruffians, and such as the world hates, subject to their lust, and gaining thy living at the hands of every diseased lecher. Oh, what a miserable trade of life is thine that livest of the vomit of sin, in hunting after maladies! But suppose, while thou art young, thou art favoured of thy companions; when thou waxest old, and that thy beauty is vaded,[7] then thou shalt be loathed and despised even of them that professed most love unto thee. Then, good sister, call to mind the baseness of thy life, the heinous outrage of thy sin, that God doth punish it with the rigour of his justice. Oh, thou art made beautiful, fair, and well-formed, and wilt thou then by thy filthy lust make thy body, which, if thou be honest, is the temple of God, the habitation of the Devil?[8] Consider this, and call to God for mercy, and amend thy life. Leave this house, and I will become thy faithful friend in all honesty, and use thee as mine own sister."

At this, such a remorse of conscience, such a fearful terror of my sin struck into my mind that I kneeled down at his feet, and with tears besought him he would help me out of that misery, for his exhortation had caused in me a loathing of my wicked life, and I would not only become a reformed woman, but hold him as dear as my father that gave me life. Whereupon he kissed me with tears, and so we went down together, where we had further communication, and presently[9] he provided me another lodging, where I not only used myself so honestly, but also was so penitent, every day in tears for my former folly, that he took me to his wife, and how I have lived since and loathed filthy lust, I refer myself to the majesty of God, who knoweth the secrets of all hearts.

Thus, countrymen, I have published the conversion of an English courtesan, which if any way it be profitable either to forewarn youth or withdraw bad persons to goodness, I have the whole end of my desire, only craving every father would bring up his children with careful nurture, and every young woman respect the honour of her virginity.

[...]

—1592

---

1 covert secrecy, concealment.

2 "Be sure of this, that no fornicator or impure man, or one who is covetous (that is, an idolater), has any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and of God" (Ephesians 5:5).

3 suffereth allows, permits.

4 payeth home visits with retribution, punishes.

5 inconvenience harm, injury.

6 loose wanton, licentious.

7 vaded faded, decayed.

8 "Do you not know that you are God's temple and that God's Spirit dwells in you? If anyone destroys God's temple, God will destroy him. For God's temple is holy, and that temple you are" (1 Corinthians 3:16-17). See also 1 Corinthians 6:19-20.

9 presently without delay, at once.

from Greene's Groatsworth of Wit, Bought with a Million of Repentance.[1]

Describing the Folly of Youth, the Falsehood of Make-Shift Flatterers, the Misery of the Negligent, and Mischiefs of Deceiving Courtesans. Written before His Death and Published at His Dying Request.[2]

The Printer to the Gentle Readers.

I have published here, gentlemen, for your mirth and benefit Greene's Groatsworth[3] of Wit. With sundry of his pleasant discourses, ye have been before delighted, but now hath death given a period to his pen. Only this happened into my hands which I have published for your pleasures. Accept it favourably, because it was his last birth and not least worth, in my poor opinion. But I will cease to praise that which is above my conceit,[4] and leave itself to speak for itself, and so abide your learned censuring.[5]

Yours,
W.W.

To the Gentlemen Readers.

Gentlemen, the swan sings melodiously before death that in all his lifetime useth but a jarring sound.[6] Greene, though able enough to write, yet deeplier searched[7] with sickness than ever heretofore, sends you his swan-like song, for that he fears he shall never again carol to you wonted love lays,[8] never again discover to you youth's pleasures. However yet sickness, riot, incontinence have at once shown their extremity, yet if I recover, you shall all see more fresh sprigs than ever sprang from me, directing you how to live, yet not dissuading ye from love. This is the last I have writ, and I fear me the last I shall writ. And however I have been censured for some of my former books, yet, gentlemen, I protest they were as I had special information. But passing them, I commend this to your favourable censures, and like an embrion[9] without shape (I fear me) will be thrust into the world. If I live to end it, it shall be otherwise: if not, yet will I commend it to your courtesies, that you may as well be acquainted with my repentant death, as you have lamented my careless course of life. But as nemo ante obitum felix, so acta exitus probat.[10] Beseeching therefore so to be deemed hereof as I deserve, I leave the work to your likings, and leave you to your delights.

Greene's Groatsworth of Wit.

[Once, there was a "new-made gentleman" named Gorinius, who had gained a great fortune through usury. He had two sons: Lucanio, who had been brought up to succeed his father as a usurer, and Roberto, who had become a scholar and married a "proper gentlewoman." Gorinius loves Lucanio and despises Roberto, largely because the latter has

---

[1] Readers interested in the entire text of Groatsworth should consult D.A. Carroll's superlative edition published in 1994 for Medieval and Renaissance Texts and Studies (Binghamton, NY). Carroll convincingly argues that Groatsworth's authorship is a more complicated matter than it might at first appear: In his Kind-Heart's Dream (1592), the work's printer, Henry Chettle, claimed that he had simply gathered together and prepared for the press a work which Greene had left at the time of his death; he insisted that Greene was the sole author of Groatsworth, and that his (Chettle's) only role had been to write a fair copy for the perusal of the licensor. As Carroll notes, Chettle's emphatic denial that he himself was Groatsworth's author suggests that there were persistent questions to this effect circulating soon after its publication. Carroll offers a detailed account of the controversy at the time, subsequent critical reactions to it, and finally a convincing description of the work's probable origins and authorship. He concludes that Chettle possibly functioned as a collaborator, compiler, and editor, perhaps bringing together his own contributions, Greene's autobiographical papers, and perhaps even the work of others; Chettle may even be the sole author of Groatsworth, with Carroll leaning towards this latter view (Introduction, p. 1). For the full argument, see pp. 1-31.

[2] The title page includes the following Latin epigram: Foelicem fuisse infaustum ("To have been happy once is now to be miserable").

[3] Groatsworth A groat was coin worth about fourpence, meaning fig. a very small amount.

[4] conceit understanding.

[5] censuring judgement, evaluation.

[6] Proverb, "Like a swan, he sings before his death" (Tilley S1028). See also Erasmus, Adages, 414e.

[7] searched tested (to reveal the nature of).

[8] wonted love lays customary love songs.

[9] embrion i.e., embryo.

[10] nemo ante obitum felix Latin, "No one is happy before death" (Metamorphosis, 3.137); acta exitus probat Latin, "The outcome is the measure of our actions" (Ovid, Heroides, 2.85), sometimes translated as "The end [result] justifies the means [deed]."

not shown proper respect to the business of accumulating money. Gorinius dies, leaving all of his estate to Lucanio, and Roberto becomes increasingly angry and envious over how little he has been left. Roberto then conspires with a prostitute of his acquaintance, Lamilia, to ensnare his brother and extract from him all his wealth. They initially agree that they will split the profits evenly. However, once Lamilia has won Lucanio's trust and heart, she double-crosses Roberto by informing Lucanio that Roberto has tried to entice her to betray him. Lucanio believes her, disowns his brother, and has him thrown out of Lamilia's house.]

Roberto in an extreme ecstasy[1] rent his hair, cursed his destiny, blamed his treachery, but most of all exclaimed against Lamilia,[2] and in her against all enticing courtesans, in these terms:

What meant the poets in invective verse
To sing Medea's shame and Scylla's pride,[3]
Calypso's[4] charms, by which so many died?
Only for this their vices they rehearse,[5]
That curious wits which in this world converse
May shun the dangers and enticing shows
Of such false sirens, those home-breeding foes,[6]
That from their eyes their venom do disperse.
So soon kills not the basilisk[7] with sight,
The viper's tooth is not so venomous,
The adder's tongue not half so dangerous
As they that bear the shadow of delight,
Who chain blind youths in trammels of their hair,
Till waste bring woe, and sorrow haste despair.

With this he laid his head on his hand, and leant his elbow on the earth, sighing out sadly,

Heu patior telis vulnera facta meis![8]

On the other side of the hedge sat one that heard his sorrow, who, getting over, came towards him,

---

[1] ecstasy here, a frenzied state, occasioned by passion and rage.

[2] Lamilia perhaps a diminutive of "Lamia," whose story is recounted in Philostratus's Life of Apollonius of Tyana (4.25). She was a witch whose serpent-form (inflicted on her by the god Hermes) she could disguise beneath a veneer of stunning beauty. Lycius, a young Corinthian, is on the verge of marrying her when her true nature is revealed by his friend and mentor, Apollonius. See the recounting of this story in Robert Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy (Kila, MT, 2001), vol. 2, p. 648.

[3] Medea's shame Priestess of Hecate and daughter of Aeetes, king of Colchis, Medea falls passionately in love with Jason, the great Greek hero, and helps him achieve his goal of winning the golden fleece, in the process sacrificing her loyalty to her father and her virginity to her erotic desires. To regain for Jason his father Aeson's throne, usurped by Aeson's brother Pelias, she tricks Pelias' daughters into murdering their father. When Jason abandons her and marries another, she destroys the new bride, burning her father's palace to the ground. Medea's passionate desire for revenge leads her to murder two of her own children by Jason (Metamorphoses 7.1-431); Scylla's pride The sea-nymph Scylla's scornful rejection of Glaucus, a god of the sea, leads the sorceress Circe, jealous of Scylla's power over a god she herself desires, to transform her into a monster, replacing her thighs, legs, and feet with a pack of ferocious, incessantly barking dogs (Metamorphoses, 13.892-14.85). Homer's Odyssey gives her twelve feet and six monstrous heads; from her rock in the strait between Italy and Sicily she snatches up men from passing ships and devours them. For a poetic treatment of this myth, see the selections from Thomas Lodge's "Scylla's Metamorphosis," in this anthology's additional online texts.

[4] Calypso In Homer's Odyssey, the island nymph and daughter of Atlas, who fell in love with and imprisoned the wandering Odysseus on her island Ogygia for seven years; she released him only when commanded to do so by Jupiter/Zeus, king of the gods. While classical authors acknowledge Calypso's stunning beauty, they do not seem to suggest that she was responsible for any deaths.

[5] rehearse recount, describe.

[6] sirens a group of sea nymphs whose singing was so enthralling that listeners would become entranced, losing themselves in the music and finally starving to death because they forgot to eat. They appear most famously in Homer's Odyssey; home-breeding foes enemies to the breeding and bringing up (of children) in the home, and thus enemies to the marital relations which result in legitimate children. "Home-bred" can also describe those lacking breadth of culture and experience, who are unpolished and unsophisticated, just the sort of men that Lamilia is most successful in preying upon.

[7] basilisk a fabulous reptile; its hissing reputedly drove away all other serpents; its breath, and even its look, was fatal (Pliny, Natural History, 2.356-57).

[8] Latin, "Alas, I suffer wounds created by my own spears." The speaker, Phyllis, is lamenting the aid she has recently given to her beloved, Demophoon—aid which has allowed him to return to his homeland Attica, from whence (in violation of his promises) he has not returned (Ovid, Heroides, 2.48).

and broke off his passion. When he approached, he saluted Roberto in this sort:

"Gentleman," quoth he, "(for so you seem) I have by chance heard you discourse some part of your grief, which appeareth to be more than you will discover or I can conceit.[1] But if you vouchsafe[2] such simple comfort as my ability may yield, assure yourself that I will endeavour to do the best that either may procure you profit, or bring you pleasure: the rather, for that I suppose you are a scholar, and pity it is men of learning should live in lack."

Roberto, wondering to hear such good words, for that this iron age[3] affords few that esteem of virtue, returned him thankful gratulations,[4] and (urged by necessity) uttered his present grief, beseeching his advice how he might be employed.

"Why, easily," quoth he, "and greatly to your benefit, for men of my profession get by scholars their whole living."

"What is your profession?" said Roberto.

"Truly, sir," said he, "I am a player."[5]

"A player?" quoth Roberto. "I took you rather for a gentleman of great living, for if by outward habit men should be censured,[6] I tell you, you would be taken for a substantial man."

"So am I where I dwell," quoth the player, "reputed able at my proper cost[7] to build a windmill. What though the world once went hard with me, when I was fain to carry my playing fardel a footback:[8] Tempora mutantur.[9] I know you know the meaning of it better than I, but I thus conster it: 'it's otherwise now,' for my very share in playing apparel will not be sold for £200."[10]

"Truly," said Roberto, "'tis strange that you should so prosper in that vain practice, for that it seems to me your voice is nothing gracious."

"Nay, then," said the player, "I mislike your judgement. Why, I am as famous for Delphrigus and the King of Fairies as ever was any of my time. The twelve labours of Hercules have I terribly thundered on the stage, and played three scenes of the Devil in The Highway to Heaven."[11]

"Have ye so?" said Roberto. "Then I pray you pardon me."

---

1 conceit conceive, imagine.

2 vouchsafe are willing to graciously accept; deign to accept.

3 iron age In classical literature, the golden age was the age of original human and natural perfection; Hesiod's poem Works and Days is the ultimate source for the division of history into a series of increasingly degenerate ages of mankind: silver, bronze, iron.

4 gratulations expression of thanks; thanksgiving.

5 D.A. Carroll notes that while the player might have been recognizable to contemporary readers, his identity remains unknown. "The Player should be understood," he continues, "primarily, to represent the successful actors of the day, to be a type of those who have derived their wealth and smugness from an old fashioned repertory being refurbished by poets like Roberto and from a talent which, though they themselves think well of it, is, in Roberto's view, quite modest. The whole was probably meant as an allegory of the arrival on the dramatic scene of Greene and his kind, the University Wits." Carroll argues that the scene's "content and attitude" are deeply indebted to Nashe's 1589 preface to Menaphon ("The Player-Patron in Greene's Groatsworth of Wit [1592]" Studies in Philology 91.3 [Summer 1994]: 303). Carroll offers the various arguments concerning the Player's identity as Shakespeare, Edward Alleyn, James Burbage, Robert Wilson, and Anthony Munday (pp. 307-12). For a more detailed account of the issues surrounding the Player's identity and the representation of the writing and performing of plays in the 1580s and 1590s, see D.A. Carroll, ed., "Appendix D, 'The Player-Patron'" in Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (Binghamton, NY, 1994), pp. 111-13.

6 if by outward habit men should be censured i.e., if by their outward appearance or clothing men should be evaluated or judged.

7 at my proper cost i.e., entirely at my own expense. Carroll suggests that this may refer to the Theatre, which "stood on the edge of Finsbury Fields near three very conspicuous windmills," although two other theatres in London were also situated near windmills ("The Player-Patron," p. 308).

8 fain to carry my playing fardel a footback i.e., obliged or necessitated to carry the pack (fardle) containing my actor's accoutrements on (my) back ("footback" is a humorous variation on "horseback").

9 Latin, "times change." Proverb: "Times change and we with them" (Tilley T343).

10 my very share in playing apparel will not be sold for £200 i.e., the player owns a share in his company's acting wardrobe which if he sold it would bring him a substantial amount of money. Although costumes accounted for a significant proportion of a company's capital wealth, the player's estimation is highly exaggerated. For some sense of the value of such costumes in the period, see Elizabethan Stage 1.372: "Richard Jones ... sold his share in a stock of apparel, play-books, instruments, and other commodities for £37 10s. in 1589." Chambers estimates "the total value of the contents of a tiring-house [where costumes and props were stored] might be anything from £500 to £1,000."

11 These references are all to characters in various plays, none of which seem any longer to be extant, and all of which "reflect not the experience of any specific individual but rather the (continued)

"Nay, more," quoth the player, "I can serve to make a pretty speech, for I was a country author, passing at a moral, for 'twas I that penned The Moral of Man's Wit, The Dialogue of Dives, and for seven years' space was absolute interpreter to the puppets.[1] But now my almanac is out of date:

The people make no estimation
Of morals teaching education.[2]

Was not this pretty for a plain rhyme extempore? If ye will, ye shall have more."

"Nay, it's enough," said Roberto. "But how mean you to use me?"

"Why, sir, in making plays," said the other, "for which you shall be well paid, if you will take the pains."

Roberto, perceiving no remedy, thought best in respect of his present necessity to try his wit, and went with him willingly; who lodged him at the town's end in a house of retail,[3] where what happened our poet, you shall after hear. There, by conversing with bad company, he grew a malo in peius,[4] falling from one vice to another; and so having found a vein to finger crowns, he grew cranker[5] than Lucanio, who by this time began to droop, being thus dealt with by Lamilia. She, having bewitched him with her enticing wiles, caused him to consume in less than two years that infinite treasure gathered by his father with so many a poor man's curse. His lands sold, his jewels pawned, his money wasted, he was cashiered by Lamilia, that had cozened[6] him of all. Then walked he like one of Duke Humphrey's squires,[7] in a thread-bare cloak, his hose drawn out with his heels, his shoes unseamed, lest his feet should sweat with heat. Now (as witless as he was) he remembered his father's words, his unkindness to his brother, his carelessness of himself. In this sorrow he sat down on penniless bench;[8] where when Opus and Usus told him by the chimes in his stomach it was time to fall unto meat, he was fain with the chameleon to feed upon the air,[9] and make patience his best repast.

---

dramatic activity in general of the seventies and early eighties." In his preface to Menaphon, Nashe offers both Delphrigus and the King of Fairies as typical of the roles "of the struggling actors' repertory before the arrival of the poets." Delphrigus sounds like "the knight of the dramatized chivalric romance ... in plays modeled after the Italian," while the King of Fairies "may refer to Huon of Bordeaux, performed as an old play ... at the Rose in December 1593" (Carroll, "The Player-Patron," pp. 303-04). The twelve labours of Hercules were represented a number of times in early modern drama, and the hero's speeches became a by-word for a particular kind of "over-the-top" ranting, which took its inspiration in the period from Seneca's Hercules Furens; three scenes of the Devil in The Highway to Heaven, apparently a late morality play, no longer extant (ibid., pp. 304-05).

[1] passing at a moral i.e., skilled in the composition of a morality play; Carroll notes that The Moral of Man's Wit, of which we have no record, "probably points not to any one play but to the group of Wit interludes in which Wit is presented as entering into manhood" (such as Marriage of Wit and Wisdom [1570-79?]) ("The Player-Patron," p. 305). If The Dialogue of Dives was an actual play, it does not seem to have survived; its title indicates a "scriptural comedy" (ibid., p. 305) based on the parable of Dives—the rich man—and Lazarus recounted in Luke 16:19-31; seven years' space the traditional length of an apprenticeship; absolute interpreter to the puppets i.e., he spoke the parts for puppets in puppet shows.

[2] The couplet states what is really quite obvious: that the player-playwright's works and the players' repertory have been superseded in popular estimation by the more innovative, poetically refined as well as less morally dogmatic and allegorical drama that was on the rise in the 1580s and 1590s, such as Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy (c. 1587); Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine the Great, Parts I and II (1587-88), The Jew of Malta (1589-90); and Shakespeare's Henry VI plays (c. 1589-92). In saying that "[his] almanac is out of date," the player-playwright is indicating that time and theatrical fashion have left him behind, that his out-dated morality plays no longer please.

[3] house of retail brothel; house of prostitution.

[4] Latin (although the more usual formulation would be a malo ad peius): "from bad to worse."

[5] a vein to finger crowns i.e., a method to gain money (with the strong implication contained in the verb "finger," that this money is achieved sordidly and unworthily); cranker more aggressively high-spirited, disposed to exult or triumph; "cockier."

[6] cashiered generally a military term, meaning to dismiss from service; cozened cheated.

[7] Duke Humphrey's squires See p. 1018, note 12.

[8] Proverb, "to sit on penniless bench" (i.e., to live in extreme poverty) (Tilley P187). There was an actual "penniless bench" near Carfax Church in Oxford, a place for the lazy, idle, and poor (Topographical Dict., p. 402).

[9] Opus and Usus Latin, "toil and habit"; fall unto meat i.e., have a meal; with the chameleon to feed upon the air Proverb, "A man cannot live on air like a chameleon" (Tilley M226; cf. Hamlet, 3.2.97). Pliny writes

While he was at this feast, Lamilia came flaunting by, garnished with the jewels whereof she beguiled him, which sight served to close his stomach after his cold cheer.[1] Roberto, hearing of his brother's beggary, albeit he had little remorse of his miserable state, yet did seek him out to use him as a property,[2] whereby Lucanio was somewhat provided for. But being of simple nature, he served but for a block to whet Roberto's wit on; which the poor fool perceiving, he forsook all other hopes of life, and fell to be a notorious pandar,[3] in which detested course he continued till death.

But Roberto, now famozed[4] for an arch-play-making-poet, his purse like the sea sometime swelled; anon like the same sea fell to a low ebb; yet seldom he wanted,[5] his labours were so well-esteemed. Marry, this rule he kept: whatever he fingered aforehand was the certain means to unbind a bargain,[6] and being asked why he so slightly[7] dealt with them that did him good? "It becomes me," sayeth he, "to be contrary to the world, for commonly when vulgar men receive earnest,[8] they do perform; when I am paid anything afore-hand, I break my promise." He had shift[9] of lodgings, where in every place his hostess writ up the woeful remembrance of him, his laundress, and his boy;[10] for they were ever his in household, beside retainers in sundry other places. His company were lightly[11] the lewdest persons in the land, apt for pilfery,[12] perjury, forgery, or any villainy. Of these he knew the casts to cog at cards, cozen[13] at dice; by these he learned the legerdemains of nips, foists, cony-catchers, crossbiters, lifts, high lawyers,[14] and all the rabble of that unclean generation of vipers;[15] and pithily could he paint out their whole courses of craft. So cunning he was in all crafts as nothing rested in him almost but craftiness. How often the gentlewoman his wife laboured vainly to recall him is lamentable to note. But as one given over to all lewdness, he communicated her sorrowful lines among his loose trulls, that jested at her bootless[16] laments. If he could any way get credit on scores, he would then brag his creditors carried stones, comparing every round circle to a groaning O, procured by a painful burden. The shameful end of sundry his consorts, deservedly punished for their amiss, wrought no compunction in his that the efficacy of medicines made from the guts and dung of this creature is all the more remarkable since "this beast liveth upon no meat at all ..." (Pliny, Natural History, 2.316).

---

1 which sight served to close his stomach after his cold cheer i.e., the sight of Lamilia becomes ironically the "dessert" which fills up his stomach after his "meal" of air. Although OED dates the first use of "close" in this way to 1653 ("close," verb 21.b), this is clearly the meaning here. Greene may also imply that the sight of Lamilia robs Lucanio of his appetite.

2 property a mere means to an end; an instrument or tool.

3 block whetstone; also, a stupid person; pandar pimp or procurer.

4 famozed celebrated, renowned.

5 wanted lacked (in the sense that he usually did not suffer from the lack of money to buy what he needed).

6 See below. Whenever Roberto is paid a portion of his fee in advance—for example, by a company eager to secure the exclusive ownership of and playing rights to a drama he is presently working on—he treats this payment as not as acknowledgment of a contract between himself and the agent, but as an opportunity to retain a fee for services which he has no intention of supplying. On the practice of paying playwrights by installments, see Elizabethan Stage, 2.161-62. Chambers suggests that Roberto's less than ethical behaviour may have been a reality in the London theatre business (2.162-63).

7 slightly carelessly, with little respect.

8 vulgar common, ordinary; earnest money, or a sum of money, paid as an installment, especially for the purpose of securing a bargain or contract.

9 shift i.e., a string or whole series (of).

10 woeful remembrance i.e, the bill (which is a "woeful remembrance" for Roberto's various landladies because he seems to have seldom paid promptly or in full); boy page, young male servant.

11 lightly easily.

12 pilfery robbery, petty theft.

13 the casts to cog at cards the tricks to cheat at cards; cozen cheat.

14 legerdermains particular skills; nips cutpurses (in the period, people would often carry their money in a bag or purse, attached to a belt; a nip would steal a purse by cutting it away from its belt); foists pick-pockets; cony-catchers those who catch "conies" or dupes; cheats, swindlers; crossbiters those who "crossbite" or "bite the biters"; those who cheat in return or cheat by outwitting, gulling, or deceiving; lifts those who steal parcels from shops; high lawyers highwaymen (Greene, Notable Discovery, pp. 37-38).

15 generation of vipers a label applied to the Pharisees and Sadducees in Matthew 3:7; 12:34; 23:33 and Luke 3:7.

16 trulls whores, prostitutes; bootless vain, useless.

heart, of which one, brother to a brothel[1] he kept, was trussed under a tree as round as a ball.[2]

To some of his swearing companions thus it happened: a crew of them sitting in a tavern carousing, it fortuned an honest gentleman and his friend to enter their room. Some of them being acquainted with him, in their domineering drunken vein would have no nay but down he must needs sit with them; being placed, no remedy there was but he must needs keep even compass[3] with their unseemly carousing. Which he refusing, they fell from high words to sound strokes, so that with much ado the gentleman saved his own,[4] and shifted from their company. Being gone, one of these tipplers forsooth lacked a gold ring; the other swore they see the gentleman take it from his hand. Upon this the gentleman was indicted before a judge, these honest men[5] are deposed; whose wisdom,[6] weighing the time of the brawl, gave light to the jury what power wine-washing poison had. They according unto conscience found the gentleman not guilty, and God released by that verdict the innocent.

With his accusers thus it fared: one of them for murder was worthily executed; the other never since prospered; the third, sitting not long after upon a lusty horse the beast suddenly died under him. God amend the man.

Roberto, everyday acquainted with these examples, was notwithstanding nothing bettered but rather hardened in wickedness. At last was that place justified, God warneth men by dreams and visions in the night, and by known examples in the day, but if he return not, he comes upon him with judgement that shall be felt.[7] For now when the number of deceits caused Roberto be hateful almost to all men, his immeasurable drinking had made him the perfect image of the dropsy, and the loathsome scourge of lust tyrannized in his bones.[8] Lying in extreme poverty, and having nothing to pay but chalk, which now his host accepted not for current,[9] this miserable man lay comfortlessly languishing, having but one groat left (the just proportion of his father's legacy) which looking on, he cried: "Oh, now it is too late, too late to buy wit with thee, and therefore will I see if I can sell to careless youth what I negligently forgot to buy."

Here, gentlemen, break I off Roberto's speech, whose life in most parts agreeing with mine found one self[10] punishment as I have done. Hereafter

---

1 brothel prostitute.

2 brother to a brothel he kept … ball The individual in question seems to have been "trussed" in the sense of "hanged," although chiefly the expression is "trussed up" rather than "trussed under."

3 keep even compass to keep proper proportion or measure (here, to return toasts as was customary in drinking carouses).

4 his own his own life, but also, perhaps, that of his companion.

5 these honest men i.e., the gentleman and his friend.

6 whose wisdom i.e., the wisdom of the judge.

7 that place justified … felt i.e., that passage (in Scripture) confirmed or shown to be true. Although there are many famous instances in Scripture where "God warneth men by dreams and visions in the night," such as Jacob's dream in Genesis 46:2, the three wise-men's dream in Matthew 2:12, the visions of the prophet Daniel in Daniel 7:2, the visions of the apostle Paul in Acts 16:9 and 18:9, and King Nebuchadnezzar's prophetic dream in Daniel 4:4-37, only the last of these has any connection with a call to repentance, and an implied threat of retribution if this call is not heeded. Probably Greene is referring to Eliphaz's terrifying account and interpretation of his "visions of the night" in Job 4-5. In this dream, he is asked the questions "Can mortal man be righteous before God? Can a man be pure before his Maker?" (4:17), and he is offered an image of men as "house[s] of clay, whose foundation is the dust, who are crushed before the moth" (4:19). However, Eliphaz also asserts that a man's suffering is "the chastening of the Almighty," and that while God inflicts such suffering he can also offer healing: "In famine he will redeem you from death, and in war from the power of the sword. You shall be hid from the scourge of the tongue, and shall not fear destruction when it comes. At destruction and famine you shall laugh, and shall not fear the beasts of the earth" (5:17, 5:20-22). Eliphaz concludes his catalogue of the blessings of God by saying, "You shall know also that your descendants shall be many, and your offspring as the grass of the earth. You shall come to your grave in ripe old age, as a shock of grain comes up to the threshing floor in season. Lo, this we have searched out; it is true. Hear, and know it for your good" (5:25-27). Obviously, these verses echo ironically and comment tellingly on Roberto's present situation.

8 dropsy a disorder characterized by the accumulation of watery fluid in the serous cavities or connective tissue of the body; loathsome scourge of lust tyrannized in his bones Aching bones were one of the symptoms of syphilis.

9 but chalk … not for current Apparently, tavern debts were chalked up on posts (see OED, "chalk, v., 3b"). Roberto, unable to pay his debts for liquor, food, and lodging, has had his credit cut off by the owner of the inn or tavern where he has been staying.

10 one self one and the same.

suppose me the said Roberto, and I will go on with that he promised. Greene will send you now his groatsworth of wit, that never showed a mitesworth[1] in his life; and though no man now be by to do me good, yet ere I die I will by my repentance endeavour to do all men good:

Deceiving world, that with alluring toys[2]
Hast made my life the subject of thy scorn,
And scornest now to lend thy fading joys
To length my life, whom friends have left forlorn:
How well are they that die ere they be born,
And never see thy sleights, which few men shun,
Till unawares they helpless are undone.[3]

Oft have I sung of love and of his fire,
But now I find that poet was advized
Which made full feasts increasers of desire,
And proves weak love was with the poor despized.
For when the life with food is not suffized,[4]
What thought of love, what motion of delight,
What pleasance can proceed from such a wight?[5]

Witness my want,[6] the murderer of my wit;
My ravished sense of wonted fury reft[7]
Wants such conceit as should in poems fit.
Set down the sorrow wherein I am left.

But therefore have high heavens their gifts bereft:
Because so long they lent them me to use,
And I so long their bounty did abuse.

Oh, that a year were granted me to live,
And for that year my former wits restored!
What rules of life, what counsel would I give?
How should my sin with sorrow be deplored?
But I must die of every man abhorred.
Time loosely spent will not again be won;
My time is loosely spent, and I undone.

O horrenda fames,[8] how terrible are thy assaults? But vermis conscientiae,[9] more wounding are thy stings. Ah, gentlemen that live to read my broken and confused lines, look not I should (as I was wont) delight you with vain fantasies, but gather my follies altogether, and, as ye would deal with so many parricides, cast them into the fire. Call them Telegonus, for now they kill their father,[10] and every lewd line in them written is a deep, piercing wound to my heart; every idle hour spent by any in reading them brings a million of sorrows to my soul. Oh, that the tears of a miserable man (for never any man was yet more miserable) might wash their memory out with my death, and that those works with me together might be interred! But sith they cannot, let this my last work witness against them with me, how I detest them. Black is the remembrance of my black works, blacker than night, blacker than death, blacker than hell.

Learn wit by my repentance, gentlemen, and let these few rules following be regarded in your lives:

1. First, in all your actions set God before your eyes,[11] for the fear of the Lord is the beginning

[1] mitesworth The mite appears in books of commercial arithmetic in the sixteenth and seventeenth century as the lowest denomination of English money of account; here, as elsewhere, used mainly as a proverbial expression for an extremely small amount of something.
[2] toys trifles.
[3] undone ruined, utterly destroyed.
[4] suffized sufficed.
[5] pleasance enjoyment; wight referring back to "love" personified here as a person (wight person, creature, often miserable or pitiable).
[6] want destitution.
[7] My ravished sense of wonted fury reft i.e., my enraptured sense has been stripped of its accustomed fury, where "fury" means divinely inspired, poetic frenzy. He has lost his poetic inspiration. See Sidney's Defence of Poesy, pp. 717-18.
[8] Latin, "terrible hunger."
[9] Latin, "worm of conscience."
[10] Telegonus the son of Odysseus and Circe who, arriving in Ithaca, went to reveal himself to his father. In a quarrel, he ends up killing Odysseus before he knows that the man he has just killed is his father.
[11] set ... eyes "I keep the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved" (Psalm 16:8). See also Psalms 36:1, 54:3, and 86:14.

of wisdom.[1] Let his word be a lantern to your feet, and a light unto your paths;[2] then shall you stand as firm rocks, and not be moved.[3]

2. Beware of looking back,[4] for God will not be mocked;[5] of him that hath received much, much shall be demanded.[6]
3. If thou be single and canst abstain, turn thy eyes from vanity;[7] for there is a kind of women bearing the faces of angels, but the hearts of devils, able to entrap the elect if it were possible.[8]
4. If thou be married, forsake not the wife of thy youth to follow strange flesh, for whoremongers and adulterers the Lord will judge. The door of a harlot leadeth down to death, and in her lips there dwells destruction; her face is decked with odours, but she bringeth a man to a morsel of bread and nakedness, of which myself am instance.[9]

[1] for the fear … wisdom "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom; a good understanding have all those who practice it. His praise endures forever!" (Psalm 111:10); "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is insight" (Proverbs 9:10). This verse from Proverbs occurs in the midst of maxims that criticize anyone who reproves a "scoffer," recommending that a man should focus on reproving the wise men who will love rather than hate the critic for the instruction.

[2] Let … paths "Through thy precepts I get understanding; therefore I hate every false way. Thy word is a lamp to my feet and a light to my path. I have sworn an oath and confirmed it, to observe thy righteous ordinances. I am sorely afflicted; give me life, O Lord, according to thy word!" (Psalm 119:104-06).

[3] "For he will hide me in his shelter in the day of trouble; he will conceal me under the cover of his tent, he will set me high upon a rock" (Psalm 27:5); "Everyone then who hears these words of mine and does them will be like a wise man who built his house upon the rock; and the rain fell, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, but it did not fall, because it had been founded on the rock" (Matthew 7:24). "Moved" is "mocked" in the copytext, clearly a printer's error.

[4] Beware … back Christ calls two men to follow him. Both are willing, but one asks for permission to bury his father first, to whom Christ replies: "Leave the dead to bury their own dead; but as for you, go and proclaim the kingdom of God." The other asks for permission to say goodbye to his family; Christ replies: "No one who puts his hand to the plow and looks back is fit for the kingdom of God" (Luke 9:59-62). There is perhaps a secondary reference to the fate of Lot's wife, who warned by God not to look back as she and her family fled from destruction of the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, did indeed look back and was turned into a pillar of salt (Genesis 19:15-26).

[5] God … mocked "Do not be deceived; God is not mocked, for whatever a man sows, that he will also reap. For he who sows to his own flesh will from the flesh reap corruption; but he who sows to the Spirit will from the Spirit reap eternal life. And let us not grow weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap, if we do not lose heart. So then, as we have opportunity, let us do good to all men, and especially to those who are of the household of faith" (Galatians 6:7-10).

[6] of him … demanded Near the end of a talk to his disciples about the necessity of being spiritually prepared for the coming of God, "for the Son of man is coming at an unexpected hour," Christ offers the example of the good and bad stewards; the good steward behaves as if he expects the arrival of his master at any minute (i.e., justly and prudently); the bad steward takes advantage of his master's late arrival to mistreat his fellow servants and indulge his desire for food and drink. Christ asserts that severe punishment awaits those who know their "master's will but [do] not make ready or act according to his will," but that a far less severe punishment is in store for those who are ignorant of what the master has wanted: "Every one to whom much is given, of him will much be required; and of him to whom men commit much they will demand the more" (Luke 12:42-48).

[7] See Paul's injunctions concerning the relative merits of marriage and virginity in 1 Corinthians 7:1-10; 25-40.

[8] for there … possible The woman whose beauty conceals her faithless soul and her ability to destroy her lover is influenced by the description of the loose woman in Proverbs 2:16-19, but especially 6.25-27: "Do not desire her beauty in your heart, and do not let her capture you with her eyelashes; for a harlot may be hired for a loaf of bread, but an adulteress stalks a man's very life. Can a man carry fire in his bosom and his clothes not be burned?" (cf. Proverbs 7:6-27). However, the image is fairly common in misogynist texts of the period.

[9] Proverbs contains a number of exhortations to sexual fidelity within marriage; Greene refers here to Proverbs 5:15-19: "Drink water from your own cistern, flowing water from your own well. Should your springs be scattered abroad, streams of water in the streets? Let them be for yourself alone, and not for strangers with you. Let your fountain be blessed, and rejoice in the wife of your youth, a lovely hind, a graceful doe." The punishment for "whoremongers and adulterers" is described in Proverbs 6:26-35, 7:22-27. See also, "Let marriage be held in honour among all, and let the marriage bed be undefiled; for God will judge the immoral and adulterous" (Hebrews 13:4); The door … destruction "For the lips of a loose woman drip honey, and her speech is smoother than oil; but in the end she is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword. Her feet go down to death; her steps follow the path to Sheol [i.e., Hell or the land of the dead]" (Proverbs 5:3-5) and "Her house is the way to Sheol, going down to the chambers of death" (Proverbs 7:27); but … nakedness "For by means of a whorish woman a man is brought to a piece of bread" (Proverbs 6:26).

5. If thou be left rich, remember those that want, and so deal that by thy wilfulness thyself want not. Let not taverners and victualers be thy executors, for they will bring thee to a dishonourable grave.[1]
6. Oppress no man, for the cry of the wronged ascendeth to the ears of the Lord;[2] neither delight to increase by usury, lest thou lose thy habitation in the everlasting tabernacle.[3]
7. Beware of building thy house to thy neighbour's hurt, for the stones will cry to the timber, "We were laid together in blood." And those that so erect houses, calling them by their names, shall lie in the grave like sheep, and death shall gnaw upon their souls.[4]
8. If thou be poor, be also patient, and strive not to grow rich by indirect[5] means, for goods so gotten shall vanish like smoke.[6]
9. If thou be a father, master, or teacher, join good example with good counsel; else little avail precepts, where life is different.
10. If thou be a son or servant, despise not reproof;[7] for though correction be bitter at the first, it bringeth pleasure in the end.

Had I regarded the first of these rules or been obedient to the last, I had not now at my last end been left thus desolate. But now, though to myself I give consilium post facta,[8] yet to others they may serve for timely precepts. And therefore (while life gives leave) I will send warning to my old consorts, which have lived as loosely as myself; albeit weakness will scarce suffer me to write, yet to my fellow scholars about this city will I direct these few ensuing lines.

---

[1] Injunctions to charity can be found in numerous places in Scripture: "He who oppresses the poor to increase his own wealth, or gives to the rich, will only come to want" (Proverbs 22:16). See also Luke 14:12-14, 18:22-25; 1 Timothy 6:17-19. Injunctions against drunkenness and gluttony are also frequent: "Hear, my son, and be wise, and direct your mind in the way. Be not among winebibbers, or among gluttonous eaters of meat; for the drunkard and the glutton will come to poverty, and drowsiness will clothe a man with rags" (Proverbs 23:19-21). See also Proverbs 26:9-10; 1 Corinthians 6:9-10.

[2] Oppress ... Lord There are several passages which Greene refers to here: "You shall not wrong a stranger or oppress him, for you were strangers in the land of Egypt. You shall not afflict any widow or orphan. If you do afflict them, and they cry out to me, I will surely hear their cry; and my wrath will burn, and I will kill you with the sword, and your wives shall become widows and your children fatherless" (Exodus 22:21-24); "Do not rob the poor, because he is poor, or crush the afflicted at the gate; for the Lord will plead their cause and despoil of life those who despoil them" (Proverbs 22:22); "When the righteous cry for help, the Lord hears, and delivers them out of all their troubles" (Psalm 34:17); "Thus says the Lord of hosts, 'Render true judgements, show kindness and mercy each to his brother, do not oppress the widow, the fatherless, the sojourner, or the poor' ..." (Zechariah 7:9-10).

[3] Injunctions against and regulations concerning usury are scattered throughout the Hebrew Scriptures: Exodus 22:25-27; Leviticus 25:36, 37; Deuteronomy 23:19-20. God defines, for example, the righteous man who "shall surely live" as someone who, among other virtues, "does not lend at interest or take any increase" (Ezekiel 18:8, 13, 17). Psalm 15 partly defines the man "who shall sojourn in [the Lord's] tent" and "dwell on [his] holy hill" as one "who does not put out his money at interest, and does not take a bribe against the innocent" (5).

[4] based on Jeremiah's censure of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, for his attention to his lavish palace, and his negligence of just rule: "Woe to him who builds his house by unrighteousness, and his upper rooms by injustice; who makes his neighbour serve him for nothing, and does not give him his wages; who says, 'I will build myself a great house with spacious upper rooms,' and cuts out windows for it, panelling it with cedar, and painting it with vermilion" (Jeremiah 22:13-14). Unlike his father, Jehoiakim has not done "justice and righteousness," preferring "dishonest gain," the "shedding of innocent blood," and "oppression and violence" (15, 17). When he dies, Jeremiah prophesies, no one will lament him either as kinsmen or king: "With the burial of an ass he shall be buried, dragged and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem" (18-19). There is also a reference to Psalm 49, emphasizing the futility of human wisdom, wealth and pomp: "Their graves [i.e., of the wise, the foolish, and the stupid] are their homes forever, their dwelling places to all generations, though they named lands their own. Man cannot abide in his pomp, he is like the beasts that perish. This is the fate of those who have foolish confidence, the end of those who are pleased with their portion. Like sheep they are appointed for Sheol; Death shall be their shepherd; straight to the grave they descend, and their form shall waste away; Sheol shall be their home" (11-14).

[5] indirect deceitful, dishonest.

[6] shall vanish like smoke from one of the apocalyptic prophecies in Isaiah: "Lift up your eyes to the heavens, and look at the earth beneath; for the heavens will vanish like smoke, the earth will wear out like a garment, and they who dwell in it will die like gnats; but my salvation will be for ever, and my deliverance will never be ended" (51:6).

[7] If thou be a son ... reproof a constant theme in Proverbs; see Proverbs 1:8-9, 23-26; 3:11-12; 13:1; 15:10.

[8] Latin, "counsel or advice after the events."

To Those Gentlemen His Quondam[1] Acquaintance, That Spend Their Wits in Making Plays, R.G. Wisheth a Better Exercise, and Wisdom to Prevent His Extremities.

If woeful experience may move you, gentlemen, to beware, or unheard of wretchedness entreat you to take heed, I doubt not but you will look back with sorrow on your time past, and endeavour with repentance to spend that which is to come. Wonder not (for with thee will I first begin), thou famous gracer of tragedians,[2] that Greene, who hath said with thee (like the fool in his heart) "There is no God,"[3] should now give glory unto his greatness;[4] for penetrating is his power, his hand lies heavy upon me,[5] he hath spoken unto me with a voice of thunder,[6] and I have felt he is a God that can punish enemies. Why should thy excellent wit, his gift, be so blinded that thou shouldst give no glory to the giver? Is it pestilent Machiavellian policy that thou hast studied? O peevish folly! What are his rules but mere confused mockeries able to extirpate in small time the generation of mankind? For if sic volo, sic iubeo[7] hold in those that are able to command, and if it be lawful fas et nefas[8] to do anything that is beneficial, only tyrants should possess the earth;[9] and they striving to exceed in tyranny should each to other be a slaughterman, till the mightiest outliving all, one stroke were left for death, that in one age man's life should end. The broacher of this diabolical atheism is dead, and in his life had never the felicity he aimed at, but as he began in craft, lived in fear and ended in despair.[10] Quam inscrutabilia sunt Dei iudicia?[11] This murderer of many brethren had his conscience seared like Cain;[12] this betrayer of [2] Critics agree that the "famous gracer of tragedians" refers to Christopher Marlowe (1564-93), Greene's friend, fellow playwright, and "University Wit." For a full discussion of Greene's representations of Marlowe in print and Marlowe's apparent reaction to Groatsworth, see D.A. Carroll, ed., "Appendix E: 'Thou famous gracer of Tragedians'" in Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (Binghamton, 1994), pp. 117-21. As Carroll notes, Greene's charging of Marlowe with atheism was extremely serious and perhaps largely accounts for the pamphlet's sensational reception at the time: convicted atheists would be tortured and publically executed (hanged or burnt at the stake) (p. 117). In Kind Heart's Dream (1592), Chettle tells us that he deleted an additional accusation against Marlowe which "to publish" would have been "intolerable." Critics have speculated on whether this charge may have been related to Marlowe's homosexuality.

[1] Quondam former.

[3] like the fool … no God "The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God.' They are corrupt, they do abominable deeds, there is none that does good" (Psalm 14:1).

[4] give glory … greatness See, for example, Joshua 7:19; Psalm 29:1-2, 96:7-8, and 115:1.

[5] his hand … upon me 1 Samuel 5-6, recounts God's punishment of the Philistines for their seizure and desecration of the Ark of the Covenant: they placed it in a temple in Ashdod, next to a statue of their god, Dagon: "The hand of the Lord was heavy upon the people of Ashdod, and he terrified and afflicted them with tumours, both Ashdod and its territory" (5:6). It is a common image of God's wrath with sinners: "When I declared not my sin, my body wasted away through my groaning all day long. For day and night thy hand was heavy upon me; my strength was dried up as by the heat of summer" (Psalm 32:3-4). See also Exodus 9:2-3; Deuteronomy 2:15; Judges 2:14-15.

[6] voice of thunder a common description of God's voice and power. See 1 Samuel 7:10; 2 Samuel 22:14; Job 26:14 and 37:1-5; Psalm 18:13, 77:18, and 104:7; Revelation 14:2.

[7] Latin, misquoted from Juvenal's Satires, 6.223: hoc volo, sic iubeo—"As I wish, so I command."

[8] Latin, "by just and unjust means."

[9] as opposed to Christ's promise in the Sermon on the Mount, that the meek "shall inherit the earth" (Matthew 5:5).

[10] The "broacher" is, of course, Machiavelli, whose works were considered at the time "the single greatest source of atheism in Western Europe"; indeed "his name, Niccolò ('Old Nick'), at that time became and has ever since remained a synonym for the devil" (G.T. Buckley, Atheism in the English Renaissance [Chicago, 1932], p. 31). Although the description of Machiavelli's life as marred by murder and fear was fairly common in his popular representations in England, Machiavelli's death by suicide is apparently Greene's own invention (E. Meyer, Machiavelli and the Elizabethan Drama [New York, rept., nd.], p. 69). However, given Machiavelli's connections with atheism, this suicide may have sources elsewhere in the period's literature.

[11] Latin, "How inscrutable are the judgements of God?" See Romans 11:33: "O the depth of the riches and wisdom and knowledge of God! How unsearchable are his judgements and how inscrutable his ways!"

[12] Cain Genesis 4:1-16 recounts the troubled relationship between the brothers Cain and Abel, sons of Adam and Eve. After Cain murders his brother in anger and jealousy, God exiles Cain, but puts a mark on him to protect him from retribution. Machiavelli is also implicitly compared to those false teachers (themselves influenced by "deceitful spirits and the doctrines of demons"), described as "liars whose consciences are seared" (1 Timothy 4:1-2).

him that gave his life for him inherited the portion of Judas;[1] this apostata perished as ill as Julian.[2] And wilt thou, my friend, be his disciple? Look but to me, by him persuaded to that liberty, and thou shalt find it an infernal bondage.[3] I know the least of my demerits merit this miserable death, but wilful striving against known truth exceedeth all the terrors of my soul. Defer not (with me) till this last point of extremity, for little knowest thou how in the end thou shalt be visited. With thee I join young Juvenal, that biting satirist, that lastly with me together writ a comedy.[4] Sweet boy, might I advise thee, be advised, and get not many enemies by bitter words. Inveigh against vain men, for thou canst do it, no man better, no man so well. Thou hast a liberty to reprove all, and name none: for one being spoken to, all are offended; none being blamed no man is injured.[5] Stop shallow water still running, it will rage, or tread on a worm, and it will turn.[6] Then blame not scholars vexed with sharp lines, if they reprove thy too much liberty of reproof.

And thou no less deserving than the other two, in some things rarer, in nothing inferior; driven (as myself) to extreme shifts, a little have I to say to thee:[7] and were it not an idolatrous oath, I would swear by sweet St. George[8] thou art unworthy better hap, sith thou dependest on so mean a stay.[9] Base-minded men all three of you, if by my misery you be not warned, for unto none of you (like me) sought those burrs to cleave—those puppets (I mean) that speak from our mouths, those antics garnished in our colours.[10] Is it not strange that I, to whom they all have been beholding; is it not like that you, to whom they all have been beholding, shall (were ye in that case as I am now) be both[11] at once of them forsaken? Yes,

[1] Given that Greene presents Machiavelli's life as having ended in "despair" (i.e., suicide), he is clearly referring to the account of Judas' suicide in Matthew 27:3-10 and his providential death in Acts 1:16-20.

[2] Judas is an apostate (Latin, "apostata") because he abandoned his religious and spiritual principles in betraying Christ. Julian the Apostate (Flavius Claudius Julianus [332-363 CE]), Roman emperor and nephew of Constantine the Great, attempted to replace Christianity as the official religion of the Roman state with traditional Roman paganism. He wrote extensively against Christianity, but died without fulfilling his goal. An apocryphal story has his last words as, "Thou hast conquered, Galilean" (i.e., Jesus Christ) (Dict. Christian Church).

[3] Greene, Marlowe, Thomas Nashe, and Gabriel Harvey may all have been introduced to the works of Machiavelli at Cambridge, where he was much read (Meyer, Machiavelli, pp. 24-25). In the posthumously published The Repentance of Robert Greene (1592), Greene presents his life as not simply one characterized by profligate debauchery but (as here) by actual atheism, tendencies encouraged by his sojourn in Italy, Machiavelli's homeland, where "I saw and practised such villainy as is abominable to declare" (C1^{v}). More tellingly, he notes, "I seemed as one of no religion, but rather as a mere Atheist, contemning [i.e., despising] the holy precepts uttered by any learned preacher" (B1^{r}). To a friend he reports himself as having said, "If I may have my desire while I live, I am satisfied, let me shift [i.e., manage] after death as I may" (B2^{r}).

[4] Greene's critics have disagreed over the identity of the "young Juvenal," but although Thomas Lodge was first suggested, most now seem to agree that Thomas Nashe is the more likely candidate, both because of his reputation as a biting satirist and his relative youth (Greene calls him "sweet boy," below) compared to Lodge. For Nashe's biography, see p. 927. We do not know the identity of the collaborative comedy to which Greene refers; for some of the many guesses, see Charles Nicholl, A Cup of News: The Life of Thomas Nashe (London, 1984), pp. 124-30; Juvenal (Decimus Junius Juvenalis [c. 60-c. 130 CE]) was the Roman satiric poet whose works became a model for writers such as Marston and Hall. Nashe had a stormy relationship with the humanist scholar and writer Gabriel Harvey (1552/53-1631) and his two brothers, and they may be the "scholars vexed with sharp lines" (ll. 409-11, below). For a full discussion of the identity of the "young Juvenal" and the "scholars," see D.A. Carroll, ed., "Appendix F: 'yong Juvenal,'" in Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (Binghamton, 1994), pp. 123-29; lastly recently, lately.

[5] That satire should attack general types of vices rather than particular persons was a commonplace in the sixteenth century. For a brief discussion, see K.W. Gransden, Introduction, Tudor Verse Satire (London, 1970), pp. 22-25. See also Lodge's "To the Gentleman Readers," A Fig for Momus (1595), pp. 991-92.

[6] Proverb: "Tread on a worm and it will turn" (Tilley W909), indicating the folly of injuring even the weakest person, since he/she will still retaliate.

[7] Critics generally agree that the reference is to George Peele (c. 1557-96), dramatist and poet; extreme shifts desperate measures.

[8] St. George the patron saint of England.

[9] hap fortune; so mean a stay so ignoble or base a support.

[10] "Puppets" and "antics" refers to two different types of actors. A "puppet" is a living personator in a dramatic action, but although the OED suggests that "puppets" denote actors in pantomimes, that cannot be the case here, since Greene emphasizes that these individuals "speak from [he and his fellow dramatists'] mouths." Greene may mean that the actors are like actual puppets which are mute and inanimate until given speech and movement by their manipulators, the playwrights. An "antic" is a performer who plays a grotesque or ludicrous part; a clown or mountebank. Both are derogatory terms.

[11] both i.e., Greene himself, and Marlowe, Nashe, and Peele.

trust them not: for there is an upstart crow, beautified with our feathers,[1] that with his tiger's heart wrapped in a player's hide, supposes he is as well able to bombast out a blank verse as the best of you;[2] and being an absolute Johannes fac totum is in his own conceit the only Shake-scene[3] in a country. Oh, that I might entreat your rare wits to be employed in more profitable courses, and let those apes[4] imitate your past excellence, and never more acquaint them with your admired inventions! I know the best husband of you all will never prove an usurer,[5] and the kindest of them all will never prove a kind nurse.[6] Yet whilst you may, seek you better masters, for it is pity men of such rare wits should be subject to the pleasure of such rude grooms.[7]

In this I might insert two more, that both have writ against these buckram gentlemen.[8] But let their own works serve to witness against their own wickedness, if they persevere to maintain any more such peasants.[9] For other newcomers, I leave them to the mercy of these painted monsters, who (I doubt not) will drive the best-minded to despise them; for the rest,[10] it skills not though they make a jest at them.

But now return I again to you three, knowing my misery is to you no news, and let me heartily entreat you to be warned by my harms. Delight not (as I have done) in irreligious oaths, for from the blasphemer's house a curse shall not depart.[11]

---

[1] Shakespeare is attacked here and in the following derogatory comments, which focus on charging the young playwright with plagiarism, ingratitude, and arrogance. An "upstart" is an individual who has recently risen to a place of prominence, with the strong implication that he does not deserve his new status. The crow has a particularly poor reputation in English lore, being proverbially ungrateful ("Breed up a crow and she will peck out your eyes" [Tilley C846]) and unreasonably and ludicrously prideful ("He struts like a crow in a gutter" [Tilley C852]). Both these charges against Shakespeare are expanded upon in Greene's subsequent comments. The crow's common representation as a carrion bird that displays its hypocrisy and ingratitude by first weeping over the carcass that it then consumes, the carcass that it depends upon for its very life, offers an unflattering image of Shakespeare as "feeding off" the dying carcass of Greene's talent ("The crow bewails the sheep and then eats it" [Tilley C847]). That Shakespeare "is beautified with our feathers" also suggests that his growing fame is based on the appropriation of others' work; the crow was sometimes used as a symbol of the plagiarizing writer. For a concise survey and judicious evaluation of the critical controversy surrounding this attack, see D.A. Carroll, ed., "Appendix G: 'upstart crow,'" Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (Binghamton, NY, 1994), pp. 131-45.

[2] The quotation is a parody of Shakespeare's 3 Henry VI, 1.4.137: "O tiger's heart wrapped in a woman's hide!"; bombast out render grandiose through the use of inappropriately inflated language; blank verse verse without rhyme; especially the iambic pentameter or unrhymed heroic, the regular measure of English dramatic and epic poetry; it became the dominant meter for these genres partly through the influence of Marlowe's and Shakespeare's plays.

[3] Johannes fac totum Latin, literally "John Do-everything," entering English as "Johannes Factotum," a "Jack of all trades," a supposed universal genius, a person who tries to do everything and does nothing well or even competently; Shake-scene one who shakes the stage, in reference to Shakespeare's imitation of Marlowe's "mighty lines." Greene's use of this word is unique.

[4] apes slavish mimics.

[5] husband one who manages his affairs with skill and thrift; a frugal or provident man. The implication here, perhaps, is that Shakespeare himself will "prove" or has "proven" to be a usurer. Figuratively, Greene accuses Shakespeare of unscrupulously appropriating that which does not belong to him (similar to the charge of plagiarism which he also lays), greedily amassing it for himself, and loaning it out only on punishingly harsh conditions.

[6] kindest of them all … nurse This must refer to Shakespeare and by implication other upstart player-playwrights, but also players in general, who have not proven to Greene to be "kind nurses" in his poverty and illness, and will not prove to be so to Marlowe, Nashe, or Peele.

[7] rude grooms unlearned or ignorant servants, in contrast to the university-educated Greene, Marlowe, Nashe, and Peele. The attack again seems to be both on player-playwrights and players generally.

[8] two more … buckram gentlemen The "two more" has occasioned a flurry of inconclusive speculation, even with the clue that both of these playwrights had attacked the players, but also had written and continued (at least up to 1592) to write for them. Among the more popular candidates have been Stephen Gosson, Anthony Munday, Thomas Lodge, John Lyly, and Thomas Kyd. For a full list with citations, see D.A. Carroll, ed., Greene's Groatsworth of Wit (Binghamton, 1994), p. 86, note 1.

[9] if they persevere to maintain any more such peasants i.e., if they continue to write plays to support the players (who are "peasants," although they pretend to be gentlemen [buckram = fake, counterfeit]).

[10] the rest i.e., those who write for players.

[11] Cf. Matthew 12:31: "Therefore I tell you, every sin and blasphemy will be forgiven men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit will not be forgiven" (cf. Mark 3:29; Luke 12:10).

Despise drunkenness, which wasteth the wit and maketh men all equal unto beasts. Fly lust as the deathsman of the soul, and defile not the temple of the Holy Ghost.[1] Abhor those epicures, whose loose life hath made religion loathsome to your ears, and when they soothe you with terms of mastership, remember Robert Greene, whom they have often so flattered, perishes now for want of comfort.

Remember, gentlemen, your lives are like so many lighted tapers, that are with care delivered to all of you to maintain. These with wind-puffed wrath may be extinguished,[2] which drunkenness put out, which negligence let fall, for man's time is not of itself so short but it is more shortened by sin.[3] The fire of my light is now at the last snuff, and for want of wherewith to sustain it there is no substance left for life to feed on. Trust not then (I beseech ye) to such weak stays,[4] for they are as changeable in mind as in many attires. Well, my hand is tired, and I am forced to leave where I would begin; for a whole book cannot contain their wrongs, which I am forced to knit up in some few lines of words.

Desirous that you should live, though himself be dying,

Robert Greene.[5]

[...]

A Letter Written to His Wife, Found with This Book after His Death.

The remembrance of the many wrongs offered thee and thy unreproved virtues add greater sorrow to my miserable state than I can utter or thou conceive. Neither is it lessened by consideration of thy absence (though shame would hardly let me behold thy face), but exceedingly aggravated, for that I cannot (as I ought) to thy own self reconcile myself, that thou mightest witness my inward woe at this instant, that have made thee a woeful wife for so long a time. But equal[6] heaven hath denied that comfort, giving at my last need like succour as I have sought all my life: being in this extremity as void of help as thou hast been of hope. Reason would that, after so long waste,[7] I should not send thee a child to bring thee greater charge. But consider he is the fruit of thy womb, in whose face regard not the father's faults so much as thy own perfections. He is yet Greene,[8] and may grow straight if he be carefully tended; otherwise, apt enough (I fear me) to follow his father's folly. That I have offended thee highly I know; that thou canst forget my injuries I hardly believe. Yet persuade I myself, if thou saw my wretched estate thou couldst not but lament it; nay, certainly I know thou wouldst. All my wrongs

---

1 deathsman executioner; defile … Ghost See p. 1026, note 8.

2 lighted tapers … extinguished taper: wax candle. "Yea, the light of the wicked is put out, and the flame of his fire does not shine. The light is dark in his tent, and his lamp above him is put out" (Job 18:5-6) and "How often is it that the lamp of the wicked is put out? That their calamity comes upon them? That God distributes pains in his anger?" (Job 21:17); "Fret not yourself because of evildoers, and be not envious of the wicked; for the evil man has no future; the lamp of the wicked will be put out" (Proverbs 24:19-20). See also Matthew 5:14-16, where Christ describes the nature of witnessing: "You are the light of the world. A city set on a hill cannot be hid. Nor do men light a lamp and put it under a bushel, but on a stand, and it gives light to all in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and give glory to your Father who is in heaven" (cf. Mark 4:21-23; Luke 8:16-17 and 11:33-36).

3 "The fear of the Lord prolongs life, but the years of the wicked will be short" (Proverbs 10:27) [cf. Psalm 37:8-11, 20, 38; 58:3, 8].

4 stays supports.

5 Greene offers at this point a retelling of Aesop's fable, "The Ant and the Grasshopper," wherein the ant works all summer to lay up provisions for winter, while the grasshopper plays all day, scorning labour and the ant's prudence. When winter comes, the ant lives, but the grasshopper dies, but not before he engraves his own epitaph in the sand, which reads in part: "My wretched end may warn green, springing youth / To use delights, as toys that will deceive, / And scorn the world before the world them leave: / For all the world's trust is ruin without ruth. / Then blest are they that like the toiling ant, / Provide in time 'gainst winter's woeful want." Greene ends by comparing himself to the grasshopper and then says: "Now faint I of my last infirmity, beseeching them that shall bury my body to publish this last farewell written with my wretched hand" (Greene, pp. 49-50).

6 equal just, impartial, fair.

7 after so long waste i.e., after so long a period of wasteful squandering (of money).

8 Greene a pun on "green": youthful, immature, and thus susceptible to being shaped or formed. The proverb occurs in various guises in Tilley T632, W27, and W136.

muster themselves before me; every evil at once plagues me.[1] For my contempt of God, I am contemned of men.[2] For my swearing and forswearing, no man will believe me. For my gluttony, I suffer hunger; for my drunkenness, thirst; for my adultery, ulcerous sores.[3] Thus God hath cast me down that I might be humbled, and punished me for example of other sinners. And although he strangely suffers me in this world to perish without succour, yet trust I in the world to come to find mercy, by the merits of my Saviour, to whom I commend thee, and commit my soul.

Thy repentant husband for his disloyalty,
Robert Greene.

Foelicem fuisse infaustum.[4]

FINIS.

—1592

[1] "For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me" (Psalm 51:3).

[2] contemned of men i.e., despised by men.

[3] ulcerous sores the result of having contracted a sexually-transmitted disease.

[4] See p. 1027, note 2.

William Kemp
fl. 1585-1602

William Kemp began his acting career travelling with the Earl of Leicester's Players during the 1580s. Returning from his Continental tours, which included time in the Netherlands, he quickly assumed the mantle of Richard Tarleton (d. 1588), the most famous comic actor and dancer of his generation. According to Thomas Nashe, at least, Kemp was considered Tarleton's direct "spiritual" heir; he described Kemp as "that most comical and conceited cavaliere Monsieur du Kempe, Jest monger and Vice-gerent generall to the Ghoste of Dicke Tarleton" ("Dedication," An Almond for a Parrot). Perhaps as early as 1589, Kemp joined Edward Alleyn's company, the Lord Strange's Men, and spent his time alternating between performances at the Rose Theatre and touring the provinces when—as was frequently the case—the theatres in London were shut down on account of the plague. In 1594, Kemp moved to the Lord Chamberlain's Men, the company of Richard Burbage and William Shakespeare, probably taking parts such as Dogberry in Much Ado About Nothing, as well as Launcelot Gobbo in The Merchant of Venice, Bottom in A Midsummer Night's Dream, and Touchstone in As You Like It. The exact reasons for Kemp's departure from the Lord Chamberlain's Men in 1599 remain a mystery. However, contemporary sources suggest that while he was enormously popular, especially for his jigs and songs and quick wit, his tendency "to steal scenes" made him less than popular with his fellow actors. It may be that Kemp's style of comic acting was quickly becoming outmoded, given its improvisatory nature within a theatre which was increasingly oriented towards a set text. Having sold his shares in the Globe, Kemp set out to capitalize on his popularity as a dancer, singer, and clown. His jig from London to Norwich in February 1600, an approximately 114-mile journey that took him four weeks, was followed, perhaps in 1601-1602, by another Continental tour with a group of English players.[1] His career as a solo performer, however, left him short of money, and by March of 1602 he had joined Worcester's Men. After this point, he passes out of the historical record, although he may be the Kemp buried in November of 1603 in London.[2]

Kemp's Nine Days' Wonder is a pamphlet with an obvious economic motive, since clearly it seeks to recreate and capitalize on the money and fame that the marathon dance had initially produced. In recreating the dance in the pamphlet press, however, Kemp also consciously rewrites the communal aspects of the medieval morris dance traditions, transforming an action participated in, supported, and—in a sense—owned by the whole community into one which is highly individualized, professionalized, and offered as a theatrical commodity for sale in the community marketplace. In other words, Kemp celebrates the ancient communal ritual of the morris dance and the virtues of hospitality, liberality, and generosity associated with it, at the same time that he resituates this ritual and its accompanying virtues within a new mercantile economy.[3] While in the pamphlet Kemp certainly seeks to align himself with the gentleman-class (and distance himself somewhat from the common people), the pamphlet is also disruptive of this class division because of the way it resembles a comic "progress," a comic version of those stately progresses undertaken by Queen Elizabeth during her reign. At the same time, the pamphlet also offers an unusual perspective on the burgeoning popular press.

EDITION: Kemps nine daies wonder. London: Printed by E. A[llde] for Nicholas Ling, 1600. STC 14923.

[1] M. Butler, "William Kemp," DNB online, 2005.

[2] Ibid.

[3] M.W. Thomas, "Kemps Nine Daies Wonder: Dancing Carnival into Market" PMLA 107.3 (May 1992): 511-13, 521.

Kemp's Nine Days' Wonder[1]

Performed in a dance from London to Norwich.[2]

Containing the pleasure, pains and kind entertainment[3] of William Kemp between London and that City in his late Morris.[4]

Wherein is somewhat set down worth note; to reprove the slanders spread of him: many things merry, nothing hurtful.

Written by himself to satisfy his friends.[5]

The Epistle Dedicatory

To the True Ennobled Lady, and His Most Bountiful Mistress, Mistress Anne Fitton,[6] Maid of Honour to the Most Sacred Maid Royal, Queen Elizabeth.

Honourable mistress, in the wane[7] of my little wit, I am forced to desire your protection, else every ballad-singer will proclaim me bankrupt of honesty. A sort of mad fellows, seeing me merrily disposed[8] in a morris, have so bepainted me in print since my gambols[9] began from London to Norwich, that (having but an ill[10] face before) I shall appear to the world without a face, if your fair hand wipe not away their foul colours. One hath written "Kemp's Farewell" to the tune of "Kery, mery, buffe"; another "His Desperate Dangers in His Late Travail";[11] the third "His Entertainment to New-market,"[12] which town I came never near by the length of half the heath. Some swear in a trenchmore[13] I have trod a good way to win the world; others that guess righter affirm I have without good help danced myself out of the world; many say many things that were never thought. But in a word, your poor servant offers the truth of his

---

[1] Nine days is proverbially how long the public will admire and pay attention to a novelty or sensation. It is understood that after nine days, this novelty will be ignored and forgotten.

[2] Kemp's journey from London to Norwich measures approximately 114 miles (Topographical Dict., 372). In the notes below we have calculated (very approximately) some of the distances between Kemp's various stops along the way using John Speed's sixteenth-century English county maps. See The Counties of Britain: A Tudor Atlas by John Speed, ed. N. Nicolson and A. Hawkyard (London, 1988). However, we have calculated the distances "as the crown flies," and they are thus inevitably somewhat underestimated.

[3] entertainment providing for the wants of a guest; hospitality.

[4] Morris dancing is an ancient form of country dancing, the origins of which remain obscure. Perhaps originating in an even older ritual dance—the sword dance—morris dancing may have been part of pagan British fertility rituals, aimed at worshiping nature perhaps through actual sacrifice. Later, morris dancing sometimes featured characters taken from the Robin Hood legends, such as Maid Marian and (of course) Robin Hood himself. By the sixteenth century, morris dancers carried ritual staves instead of swords, and wore bells and handkerchiefs. According to Douce's Illust. of Shakespeare, ii. 475, "The number of bells round each leg of the morris-dancers amounted from twenty to forty. They had various appellations, as the fore-bell, the second bell, the treble, the tenor, the base, and the double-bell. Sometimes they used trebles only; but these refinements were of later times. The bells were occasionally jingled by the hands, or placed on the arms or wrists of the parties." The rest of the costume included "garters to which bells were attached" and handkerchiefs, variously hand-held or attached to the costume's shoulder.

[5] Written by himself to satisfy his friends a common justification at this time for participating in a print market which generally had a reputation for sordid commercialism, nowhere more evident than in those works intended for popular, secular entertainment, like ballads and sensational pamphlets.

[6] Anne Fitton born in 1574, and married in 1587 to a country gentleman, Sir John Newdigate of Arbury, Warwickshire, Anne Fitton was the elder sister of the notorious Mary Fitton who was the mistress of William Herbert, the earl of Pembroke, by whom she had an illegitimate child; although Mary was indeed a maid of honour to Elizabeth I, Anne never held this position. Neither she nor her sister was ever married to a nobleman, despite the adjective "ennobled." Wiles speculates that, since it is highly unlikely to get the name of one's dedicatee wrong, Kemp's "error" may be deliberate, emphasizing his "identity as a plain man [...] with no courtly aspirations" by dedicating "his pamphlet to a lady who eschewed courtly success" (D. Wiles, Shakespeare's Clowns: Actor and Text in the Elizabethan Playhouse [Cambridge, 1987], p. 28).

[7] wane declining in power, intensity.

[8] disposed occupied.

[9] gambols here, a leap or spring in dancing.

[10] ill ugly.

[11] travail labour, toil; but also, "travel."

[12] None of these ballads appear in the STC, nor in C.R. Livingston's British Broadside Ballads of the Sixteenth Century: A Catalogue of the Extant Sheets and an Essay (New York, 1991).

[13] trenchmore a lively English country dance.

progress[1] and profit[2] to your honourable view. Receive it, I beseech you, such as it is, rude and plain, for I know your pure judgement looks as soon to see a beauty in a blackamoor,[3] or hear smooth speech from a stammerer, as to find anything but blunt mirth in a morris dancer, especially such a one as Will Kemp, that has spent his life in mad jigs[4] and merry jests. Three reasons move me to make public this journey: one, to reprove lying fools I never knew; the other, to commend loving friends, which by the way I daily found; the third, to show my duty to your honourable self, whose favours (among other bountiful friends) makes me (despite of this sad world) judge my heart cork, and my heels feathers, so that methinks I could fly to Rome (at least hop to Rome, as the old proverb is) with a mortar on my head.[5] In which light conceit,[6] I lowly beg pardon and leave, for my taborer strikes his huntsup,[7] I must to Norwich. Imagine, noble mistress, I am now setting from my Lord Mayor's,[8] the hour about seven, the morning gloomy, the company many, my heart merry.

Your worthy ladyship's most unworthy servant
William Kemp.

Kemp's Nine Days' Wonder: Performed in a Morris from London to Norwich. Wherein Every Day's Journey Is Pleasantly Set Down; To Satisfy His Friends the Truth, against All Lying Ballad-Makers; What He Did, How He Was Welcome, and by Whom Entertained.

The First Day's Journey, Being the First Monday in Clean Lent,[9] from the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor's of London.

The first Monday in Lent, the close morning promising a clear day, (attended on by Thomas Slye[10] my taborer, William Bee my servant, and George Sprat, appointed for my overseer, that I should take no other ease but my prescribed order) myself, that's I, otherwise called Cavaliero[11] Kemp, headmaster[12] of morris-dancers, high headborough[13] of heighs, and only tricker of your trill-lilles, and best bel-shangles[14] between Sion

[1] progress obviously, a journey, but Kemp also plays upon the word's reference to a state journey made by royalty or nobility. Elizabeth I's progresses, on which she was accompanied by a vast entourage, involved lengthy stays with various noblemen, during which she was treated to elaborate entertainments, jousts, hunting expeditions, etc.

[2] profit advantage or benefit; monetary gain as well as less tangible benefits are both referred to here.

[3] blackamoor an Ethiopian; in this context, any dark-skinned person.

[4] jigs a lively, rapid, springy kind of dance; also, a light performance or entertainment of a lively or comical character given at the end, or in the interval, of a play, in this period consisting mainly of song and dance. On Kemp's contribution to the jig as a popular form of entertainment, see Wiles, Shakespeare's Clowns, pp. 43-61.

[5] (at least hop to Rome, as the old proverb is) with a mortar on my head "To fly to Rome with a mortar (dish) on one's head" was apparently a legendary achievement of some famous wizard. It is one of those proverbs that refers to performing a ludicrously difficult and pointless task (Tilley R164).

[6] light conceit a witty or frivolous notion or expression.

[7] taborer strikes his huntsup drummer plays a rousing "tattoo" on his tabor, a small drum. A "huntsup" was orig. the name of an old song and its tune, sung or played to awaken huntsmen in the morning; used allusively, here, to indicate a song or tune played to rouse anyone.

[8] my Lord Mayor's Sir William Rider (Ryder) (c. 1544-1611), merchant and civic politician, was lord mayor of London (1600-01).

[9] Lent the 40-day period extending from Ash Wednesday to Easter evening, observed as a time of fasting and penitence, in commemoration of Christ's 40-day fast in the wilderness; "Clean Lent" is an obsolete label for this fasting time.

[10] perhaps related to William Slye, the actor (Kemps nine daies wonder, ed. A. Dyce, London, 1840, p. 27).

[11] Cavaliero a gentleman trained to arms; especially a horseman; a gay, sprightly military man; more generally, a courtier, a gallant.

[12] headmaster the principal master (i.e., teacher) of a school having a number of assistant masters under him.

[13] headborough a parish officer identical in function with the petty constable, whose major duty was keeping the peace within a particular parish or township; given the use of the adjective, "high," however, Kemp may be imagining himself here as a high constable, a much more important administrative figure, who was in charge of keeping the peace within a larger district.

[14] bel-shangles Although this word may mean something like "buffoon" in the period, in this instance it is probably an error for "bell-jangler" (Dict. Slang).

and Mount Surrey,[1] began frolickly to foot it, from the right honourable the Lord Mayor's of London, towards the right worshipful (and truly bountiful) Master Mayor's of Norwich.[2]

My setting forward was somewhat before seven in the morning, my taborer stroke up merrily, and as fast as kind people's thronging together would give me leave, through London I leapt. By the way many good old people, and divers[3] others of younger years, of mere kindness, gave me bowed[4] sixpences and groats,[5] blessing me with their hearty prayers and God-speeds.[6]

Being past Whitechapel,[7] and having left fair London, with all that north-east suburb before named, multitudes of Londoners left not me: but either to keep a custom which many hold—that Mile-end[8] is no walk without a recreation at Stratford Bow[9] with cream and cakes—or else for love they bear toward me, or perhaps to make themselves merry, if I should chance (as many thought) to give over my morris within a mile of Mile-end. However, many a thousand brought me to Bow, where I rested awhile from dancing, but had small rest with those that would have urged me to drinking. But I warrant you, Will Kemp was wise enough: to their full cups, kind thanks was my return, with gentlemanlike protestations as: "Truly sir, I dare not. It stands not with the congruity of my health." "Congruity," said I? How came that strange language in my mouth? I think scarcely that it is any Christian word, and yet it may be a good word for ought I know, though I never made it, nor do very well understand it. Yet, I am sure I have bought it at the word-mongers,[10] at as dear a rate, as I could have had a whole hundred of bavines[11] at the wood-mongers. Farewell "congruity," for I mean now to be more concise, and stand upon evener bases. But I must neither stand nor sit: the taborer strikes alarum. Tickle it,[12] good Tom; I'll follow thee. Farewell, Bow; have over thee, Bridge,[13] where I heard say honest conscience was once drowned. It's pity if it were so, but that's no matter belonging to our morris; let's now along to Stratford Langton.[14]

Many good fellows being there met, and knowing how well I loved the sport, had prepared a bear-baiting.[15] But so unreasonable were the multitudes of people, that I could only hear the bear roar, and the dogs howl. Therefore, forward I went with my hey de gaies[16] to Ilford,[17] where I again rested, and was by the people of the town and country thereabout very well welcomed: being offered carouses in the great spoon,[18] one whole draught being able at that time to have drawn my little wit dry; but being afraid of the old proverb

---

[1] <*> Sion near Brainford, and Mount Surrey by Norwich [Nine Days' note]. Brainford (Brentford) is 8 miles W of London (Topographical Dict., p. 73). See p. 1046, note 5.

[2] Master Mayor's of Norwich Master Roger Weild (also Weld, or Welde) had a long history of civic service in Norwich: he was a councilor (1582-85), sheriff (1585), alderman (1586-1604), clavor (1587-98), candidate for mayor (1590), auditor (1597-99), and finally mayor (1599) [An Index to Norwich City Officers, 1453-1835, ed. T. Hawes (Norfolk Record Office, 1989), p. 163].

[3] divers many.

[4] bowed bent.

[5] groats a coin worth about four pennies.

[6] God-speeds "God speed you" was an expression used to wish someone a speedy and successful journey.

[7] Whitechapel a suburb to the NE of London, outside of the city walls; the nearest city gate was Aldgate. The main road from London to Essex and the eastern counties began at Aldgate and ran through Whitechapel, Mile-end and on to Stratford le Bow (Topographical Dict., p. 564).

[8] Mile-end a hamlet outside of London proper, E of Whitechapel (Topographical Dict., p. 346).

[9] Stratford Bow i.e., Stratford at Bow (Stratford le Bow), 4½ miles NE of St. Paul's, London (Topographical Dict., p. 71).

[10] word-mongers a wordmonger is someone who deals in words, especially in strange, newly-coined, or pedantic words; here, Kemp imagines a shop (the wordmonger's shop) where a person can actually purchase words like "congruity"; monger seller.

[11] bavines bundles of brushwood used for fuel.

[12] Tickle it strike the drum.

[13] have over thee, Bridge "Have over" is a traditional cry to a ferryman; thus, here, "Take me over, Bridge."

[14] Stratford Langton a village in Essex, close to the county border with Middlesex, approximately two miles NE of Stratford at Bow.

[15] bear-baiting a popular blood-sport which involved tying a bear to a stake and setting a pack of dogs on it.

[16] hey de gaies another type of rural dance.

[17] Ilford a village in Essex about seven miles NE of London (Topographical Dict., p. 262).

[18] <*> A great spoon in Ilford holding above a quart [Nine Days' note]; carouses toasts involving repeated and copious drinking.

"He had need of a long spoon that eats with the devil,"[1] I soberly gave my boon companions[2] the slip.

From Ilford by moon-shine I set forward, dancing within a quarter of a mile of Romford,[3] where in the highway two strong jades[4] (having belike some great quarrel to me unknown) were beating and biting either of other. And such, through God's help, was my good hap that I escaped their hoofs, both being raised with their forefeet over my head, like two smiths[5] over an anvil.

There being the end of my first day's morris, a kind gentleman of London lighting from his horse, would have no nay but I should leap into his saddle. To be plain with ye, I was not proud, but kindly took his kindlier offer, chiefly thereto urged by my weariness. So I rid to my inn at Romford.

In that town, to give rest to my well laboured limbs, I continued two days, being much beholding to the townsmen for their love, but more to the Londoners that came hourly thither in great numbers to visit me, offering much more kindness than I was willing to accept.

The Second Day's Journey, Being Thursday of the First Week.

Thursday being market day at Burntwood,[6] Tom Slye was earlier up than the lark, and sounded merrily the morris. I roused myself, and returned from Romford to the place where I took horse the first night, dancing that quarter of a mile back again through Romford, and so merrily to Burntwood. Yet now I remember it well, I had no great cause of mirth, for at Romford town's end I strained my hip, and for a time endured exceeding pain. But being loath to trouble a surgeon, I held on, finding remedy by labour that had hurt me, for it came in a turn, and so in my dance I turned it out of my service again.[7]

The multitudes were so great at my coming to Burntwood, that I had much ado (though I made many entreaties and stays[8]) to get passage to my inn.

In this town, two cut-purses[9] were taken, that with other two of their companions followed me from London (as many better disposed persons did), but these two dy-doppers[10] gave out,[11] when they were apprehended, that they had laid wagers and betted about my journey. Whereupon the officers bringing them to my inn, I justly denied their acquaintance, saving that I remembered one of them to be a noted cut-purse, such a one as we tie to a post on our stage, for all people to wonder at, when at a play they are taken pilfering.[12]

This fellow and his half brother, being found with the deed, were sent to jail; their other two consorts had the charity of the town, and after a dance of trenchmore at the whipping cross,[13] they were sent back to London, where—I am afraid—there are too many of their occupation. To be

---

1 "He had need of a long spoon that eats with the devil" i.e., he that has to have dealings with crafty persons should be crafty himself (Tilley S771).

2 boon companions i.e., good fellows, often used of drinking companions.

3 Romford Rumford, a town in Essex some 12 miles NE of London (Topographical Dict., p. 442).

4 jades horses, sometimes vicious and ill-tempered.

5 smiths i.e., blacksmiths.

6 Burntwood a town in Essex, approximately 16 miles NE of London (four miles from Rumford).

7 came in a turn i.e., the pain arrived as the result of a turn or twist; I turned it out of my service again "To turn someone out of service" means to dismiss someone from employment or office.

8 stays pauses; halts.

9 cut-purses stealers of purses, thieves; so-called in this period because men wore their purses on a girdle or belt around the waist, and such thieves would cut the cord from which the purse hung.

10 dy-doppers A "didapper" is a small diving waterfowl; when applied to a person, done so to ridicule; here, referring to men who conceal themselves only to appear suddenly and unexpectedly.

11 gave out said, reported.

12 such a one as we tie to a post … when at a play they are taken pilfering also a practice mentioned in the anonymous play Nobody and Somebody (entered in Stationers' Register, 1606): "Somebody once picked a pocket in this Play-house yard, / Was hoisted on the stage, and shamed about it" (sig. 1). See P. Simpson, "Actors and Acting," Shakespeare's England, vol. 2, p. 278.

13 trenchmore at the whipping cross trenchmore See p. 1042, note 13; whipping cross A cross often occupied a central position in a town or village which was used as the site for markets, meetings, proclamations, and public punishments, such as floggings.

short, I thought myself well rid of four such followers, and I wish heartily that the whole world were clear of such companions.

Having rested well at Burntwood, the moon shining clearly, and the weather being calm, in the evening I tripped it to Ingerstone,[1] stealing away from those numbers of people that followed me. Yet do I what I could, I had above fifty in the company, some of London, the other of the country thereabout, that would needs, when they heard my tabor, trudge after me through thick and thin.

The Third Day's Journey, Being Friday of the First Week.

On Friday morning, I set forward towards Chelmsford,[2] not having past two hundred, being the least company that I had in the daytime between London and that place. Onward I went thus easily followed, till I come to Witford-bridge, where a number of country people and many gentlemen and gentlewomen were gathered together to see me. Sir Thomas Mildmay, standing at his park pale,[3] received gently a pair of garters of me (gloves, points, and garters, being my ordinary merchandise, that I put out to venter for performance of my merry voyage).[4]

So much ado I had to pass by the people at Chelmsford that it was more than an hour ere I could recover my inn gate, where I was fain to lock myself in my chamber, and pacify them with words out of a window instead of deeds. To deal plainly, I was so weary that I could dance no more.

The next morning I footed it three mile of my way toward Braintree,[5] but returned back again to Chelmsford, where I lay that Saturday and the next Sunday. The good cheer and kind welcome I had at Chelmsford was much more than I was willing to entertain, for my only desire was to refrain drink, and be temperate in my diet.

At Chelmsford, a maid not passing fourteen years of age, dwelling with one Sudley, my kind friend, made request to her master and dame, that she might dance the morris with me in a great large room. They being entreated, I was soon won to fit her with bells, beside she would have the old fashion with napking[6] on her arms, and to our jumps we fell. A whole hour she held out, but then being ready to lie down, I left her off. But thus much in her praise: I would have challenged the strongest man in Chelmsford, and amongst many I think few would have done so much.

The Fourth Day's Journey, Being Monday of the Second Week.

On Monday morning very early, I rid the three miles that I danced the Saturday before. Where alighting, my taborer struck up, and lightly tripped[7] forward, but I had the heaviest way that ever mad morris-dancer trod: yet

With "hey" and "ho," through thick and thin the hobby horse quite forgotten,[8]

---

[1] Ingerstone not identified.

[2] Chelmsford a town in Essex approximately 27 miles NE of London and 10 miles from Burntwood.

[3] Sir Thomas Mildmay (d. 1608) one of the commissioners who had received the surrender of the monasteries under Henry VIII; he made himself and his family a large fortune through the dissolution of the monasteries, and in 1540 was granted the manner of Moulsham near Chelmsford where he built a manor house; park pale the fence or boundary surrounding his park, an enclosed tract of land held by royal grant, used largely for hunting.

[4] gloves, points, and garters … to venter for performance of my merry voyage point a tagged cord used to attach the hose to the doublet, lace a bodice, and fasten various parts where buttons are now used; it is often in the period the type of something of small value. According to Wiles, Kemp distributes these small articles as pledges for a given sum wagered, although we learn near the end of the tract that Kemp has also made pledges of actual money against his successful completion of his marathon dance (Shakespeare's Clowns, p. 25); garter a band worn round the leg, either above or below the knee to keep the stocking from falling down; venter risk or hazard.

[5] Braintree a town in Essex about 40 miles NE of London (Topographical Dict., p. 73).

[6] bells … napking See p. 1042, note 4.

[7] tripped danced.

[8] the hobby horse quite forgotten In the morris-dance and on the stage (in burlesques, pantomimes, etc.), a figure of a horse made of wickerwood, or other light material was fastened about the waist of one of the performers, who imitated a spirited or frisky horse. The Puritans had succeeded in having this aspect of the morris dance banned

I follow'd as I did begin,
although the way were rotten.

This foul way I could find no ease in, thick woods being on either side the lane. The lane likewise being full of deep holes, sometimes I skipped up to the waist. But it is an old proverb, "That it is a little comfort to the miserable to have companions,"[1] and amidst this miry way, I had some mirth by an unlooked for accident.

It was the custom of honest country fellows, my unknown friends, upon hearing of my pipe (which might well be heard in a still morning or evening a mile) to get up and bear me company a little way. In this foul way, two pretty plain youths watched me, and with their kindness somewhat hindered me. One, a fine light fellow, would be still before me, the other ever at my heels. At length, coming to a broad plash of water and mud, which could not be avoided, I fetched a rise,[2] yet fell in over the ankles at the further end. My youth that followed me, took his jump, and stuck fast in the midst, crying out to his companion, "Come, George, call ye this dancing? I'll go no further." For indeed he could go no further, till his fellow was fain[3] to wade and help him out. I could not choose but laugh to see how like two frogs they laboured. A hearty farewell I gave them, and they faintly bade God speed me,[4] saying if I danced that dirty way this seven year again, they would never dance after me.

Well, with much ado I got unto Braintree by noon, tarried there Monday night and the next day, only I danced three miles on Tuesday to ease my Wednesday's journey.

If I should deny that I was welcome at Braintree, I should slander an honest crew of kind men, among whom I fared well, slept well and was every way well used.[5]

The Fifth Day's Journey, Being Wednesday of the Second Week.

Taking advantage of my three miles that I had danced the day before, this Wednesday morning I tripped it to Sudbury,[6] whither came to see a very kind gentleman, Master Foskew, that had before travailed a foot[7] from London to Barwick: who giving me good counsel to observe temperate diet for my health, and other advice to be careful of my company, besides his liberal entertainment, departed, leaving me much indebted to his love.

In this town of Sudbury, there came a lusty, tall fellow, a butcher by his profession, that would in a morris keep me company to Bury. I, being glad of his friendly offer, gave him thanks, and forward we did set. But ere ever we had measured half a mile of our way, he gave me over[8] in the plain field, protesting that if he might get a £100, he would not hold out with me; for indeed my pace in dancing is not ordinary.

As he and I were parting, a lusty country lass, being among the people, called him faint-hearted lout,[9] saying, "If I had begun to dance, I would have held out one mile, though it had cost me my life." At which words, many laughed. "Nay," saith she, "if the dancer will lend me a leash of his bells,[10] I'll venture to tread one mile with him myself." I looked upon her, saw mirth in her eyes, heard boldness in her words, and beheld her ready to tuck up her russet petticoat. I fitted her with bells, which she merrily taking, garnished her thick, short legs, and with a smooth brow bad the taborer begin. The drum struck, forward marched as a pagan superstition. This phrase is apparently part of a refrain in an old ballad, although the exact origin has not been traced. The hobby-horse became the proverbial type of things which are forgotten.

---

1 i.e., "it is good to have company in trouble (misery)" (Tilley C571).

2 rise a leap or bound upwards, especially one made with the help of a run at the outset of a long leap.

3 fain disposed, inclined.

4 God speed me See p. 1044, note 6.

5 used treated.

6 Sudbury a town in Suffolk, approximately 14 miles NE of Braintree.

7 a foot i.e., by foot.

8 gave me over deserted, abandoned me.

9 lout bumpkin, clown.

10 leash of his bells See p. 1042, note 4.

I with my merry Maid Marian,[1] who shook her fat sides, and footed it merrily to Melford,[2] being a long mile. There parting with her, I gave her (besides her skinful[3] of drink) an English crown[4] to buy more drink, for good wench[5] she was in a piteous heat. My kindness she requited with dropping some dozen of short curtsies, and bidding "God bless thee, dancer." I bad her adieu. And to give her her due, she had a good ear, danced truly, and we parted friendly. But ere I part with her, a good fellow, my friend, having writ an odd[6] rhyme of her, I will make bold to set it down:

A country lass brown as a berry,
Blithe of blee[7] in heart as merry,
Cheeks well-fed and sides well-larded,
Every bone with fat flesh guarded,
Meeting merry Kemp by chance,
Was Marian in his morris dance.
Her stump legs with bells were garnished,
Her brown brows with sweating varnished:
Her brown hips when she was lag,
To win her ground, went swig a swag,[8]
Which to see all that came after,
Were replete with mirthful laughter.
Yet she thumped it on her way,
With a sportly hey de gay,
At a mile her dance she ended,
Kindly paid and well commended.

At Melford, divers gentleman met me, who brought me to one Master Colts, a very kind and worshipful gentleman, where I had unexpected entertainment till the Saturday. From whose house having hope somewhat to amend my way to Bury,[9] I determined to go by Clare,[10] but I found it to be both farther and fouler.

The Sixth Day's Journey, Being Saturday of the Second Week.

From Wednesday night till Saturday, having been very troublesome, but much more welcome to Master Colts, in the morning I took my leave, and was accompanied with many gentlemen a mile of my way. Which mile Master Colts his fool[11] would needs dance with me, and had his desire, where leaving me, two fools parted fair in a foul way: I keeping on my course to Clare, where I a while rested, and then cheerfully set forward to Bury.

Passing from Clare towards Bury, I was invited to the house of a very bountiful widow, whose husband during his life was a yeoman[12] of that country, dying rich no doubt, as might well appear by the riches and plenty that abounded in every corner of the house. She is called the widow Everet.

At her house were met above thirty gentlemen. Such and so plentiful variety of good fare[13] I have very seldom seen in any commoner's house. Her behaviour being very modest and friendly, argued her bringing up not to be rude.[14] She was a woman of good presence,[15] and, if a fool may judge, of no small discretion.

From this widow's, I danced to Bury, coming in on the Saturday in the afternoon, at what time the right honourable the Lord Chief Justice[16] entered at another gate of the town, the wondering and

---

1 Maid Marian See p. 1042, note 4.

2 Melford a town in Suffolk, approximately two miles NW of Sudbury.

3 skinful a drinking container made of animal hide.

4 crown a coin worth about five shillings.

5 wench girl of the rustic or working classes.

6 odd singular, unique, choice.

7 Blithe of blee merry of countenance, appearance.

8 when she was lag, / To win her ground, went swig a swag i.e., when she slackened her pace or began to fall behind, to gain the advantage [her hips] swayed from side to side.

9 Bury (Bury-St-Edmunds, or St Edmunds's-Bury), a major town and regional centre in Suffolk, 71 miles from London (Topographical Dict., p. 86), and approximately eight miles NE of Clare. In 1600, its population is estimated to have been 4,500. See R. O'Day, Longman Companion to the Tudor Age (London, 1995), p. 164.

10 Clare a town in Suffolk, approximately five miles W of Melford.

11 Master Colts his fool Master Colts's professional fool or jester.

12 yeoman a freeholder under the rank of gentleman; a man holding a small landed estate, which generally he farmed himself.

13 fare food.

14 rude uncultured, unrefined.

15 presence demeanour, carriage, bearing.

16 Lord Chief Justice John Popham, chief justice of the King's Bench (served 1592-1607).

regardless multitude—making his Honour clear way—left the streets where he passed to gape at me: the throng of them being so great that poor Will Kemp was seven times stayed ere he could recover his inn. By reason of the great snow that then fell, I stayed at Bury from Saturday in the second week of my setting forth, till Thursday night the next week following.

The Seventh Day's Journey, Being Friday of the Third Week.

Upon Friday morning I set on towards Thetford,[1] dancing that ten mile in three hours, for I left Bury somewhat after seven in the morning, and was at Thetford somewhat after ten that same forenoon. But indeed considering how I had been booted[2] the other journeys before, and that all this way—or the most of it—was over a heath,[3] it was no great wonder: for I fared like one that had escaped the stocks[4] and tried the use of his legs to outrun the constable; so light was my heels, that I counted the ten miles no better than a leap.

At my entrance into Thetford, the people came in great numbers to see me: for there were many there, being size time.[5] The noble gentleman Sir Edwin Rich[6] gave me entertainment in such bountiful and liberal sort, during my continuance there Saturday and Sunday, that I want fit words to express the least part of his worthy usage of my unworthiness. And to conclude liberally[7] as he had begun and continued, at my departure on Monday, his Worship gave me five pound.

The Eighth Day's Journey, Being Monday of the Fourth Week.

On Monday morning I danced to Rockland[8] ere I rested, and coming to my inn, where my host was a very boon companion, I desired to see him: but in no case he would be spoken with, till he had shifted himself from his working day's suit. Being armed at all points, from the cap to the codpiece,[9] his black shoes shining, and made straight[10] with copper buckles of the best, his garters in the fashion, and every garment fitting corremsquandam[11] (to use his own word), he enters the hall with his bonnet[12] in his hand, began to cry out:

"O Kemp, dear Master Kemp, you are even as welcome as ... as ... as ...," and so stammering, he began to study for a fit comparison, and I thank him at last he fitted me, for saith he, "Thou art even as welcome as the Queen's best grey-hound." After this dogged yet well-meaning salutation, the carouses[13] were called in: and my friendly host of Rockland began with all this: blessing the hour upon his knees that any of the Queen's Majesty's well-willers or friends would vouchsafe[14] to come within his house, as if never any such had been within his doors before.

---

[1] Thetford a town on the border between Suffolk and Norfolk, 30 miles SW of Norwich (Topographical Dict., p. 512), and approximately 15 miles NE of Bury.

[2] booted tortured with the boot, an instrument of interrogation primarily used in Scotland.

[3] heath open, uncultivated ground.

[4] stocks another instrument of torture; public punishment for petty criminals often involved being put in the stocks, a contraption consisting of two planks set edgewise one over the other (usually framed between posts), the upper plank being capable of sliding up and down. The criminal was placed in a sitting position with his ankles confined between the two planks, the edges of which were furnished with holes to receive them. Sometimes there were added similar contrivances for securing the wrists.

[5] size time i.e. the time of the assizes, the sessions held periodically in each county of England, for the purpose of administering civil and criminal justice.

[6] Sir Edwin Rich one of the sons of Robert, Lord Rich; Edwin was knighted in 1596 and owned a manor house in Norfolk at Mulbarton.

[7] liberally generously, open-handedly.

[8] Rockland a village in Norfolk approximately eight miles N of Thetford.

[9] at all points fully and aptly; codpiece an often conspicuous and ornamented bagged appendage attached to the front of the close-fitting hose or breeches worn by men from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries.

[10] straight fittingly, correctly.

[11] corremsquandam an invented word, apparently composed of the Latin, cum + res + quandam, meaning something like "a certain aptness." Thanks to Michael Treschow (UBC-O, English) for this note.

[12] bonnet a brimless soft cap worn by men and boys.

[13] carouses the action or fashion of drinking boisterous, plentiful toasts.

[14] vouchsafe to give, grant, or bestow in a gracious or condescending manner.

I took his good meaning, and gave him great thanks for his kindness: and, having rested me well, began to take my course for Hingham,[1] whither my honest host of Rockland would needs be my guide. But, good true fat-belly, he had not followed me two fields, but he lies all along, and cries after me to come back and speak with him. I fulfilled his request, and coming to him, "Dancer," quoth he, "if thou dance a God's name,[2] God speed thee. I cannot follow thee a foot farther, but adieu, good dancer, God speed thee if thou dance a God's name."

I having haste of my way, and he being able to keep no way, there we parted. Farewell he, he was a kind good fellow, a true Troyan:[3] and it ever be my luck to meet him at more leisure, I'll make him full amends with a cup full of canary.[4] But now I am a little better advised, we must not thus let my mad host pass, for my friend late mentioned before, that made the odd rhyme on my Maid Marian, would needs remember my host. Such as it is, I'll bluntly set down:

He was a man not over spare,[5]
In his eyeballs dwelt no care;
"Anon, anon"[6] and "Welcome friend,"
Were the most words he used to spend.
Save sometime he would sit and tell,
What wonders once in Bullayne[7] fell;
Closing each period of his tale,
With a full cup of nut-brown ale.
Turwin and Turney's siege[8] were hot.
Yet all my host remembers not.
Ketsfield and Muscleborough fray[9]
Were battles fought but yesterday.
Oh, 'twas a goodly matter then,
To see your sword and buckler men;[10]
They would lie here, and here and there,
But I would meet them everywhere.
And now a man is but a prick.[11]
A boy armed with a poking stick[12]

[1] Hingham a town in Norfolk, approximately four miles N of Rockland.

[2] a God's name i.e., in God's name.

[3] Troyan i.e., Trojan: a merry or roistering fellow; a boon companion (generally a term of approval and familiarity).

[4] canary a type of wine.

[5] spare thin, lean.

[6] "Anon, anon" response to a request or order: "Coming!" "At your service!"

[7] Bullayne Boulogne, in France, attacked and taken by the English after a siege in 1544; Henry VIII personally headed the occupation.

[8] Turwin and Turney's siege The cities Turwin (Thérouanne) and Turney (Tournai) were besieged and taken by Henry VIII and his troops during the English invasion of Northern France in 1513, both conquests resulting from Henry's decision to resume the Hundred Years War; neither had much strategic value (J. Guy, Tudor England [Oxford, 1988] p. 84).

[9] Ketsfield In 1549, in enthusiastic response to the economic policies of Somerset—Edward VI's Protector during the young king's minority—Robert Kett, among others, led rebellions against the practice of enclosure. When Somerset instituted a series of commissions in various counties to examine enclosure and remedy its illegal excesses, Kett and others took this as a signal of government sympathy for rural farmers and workers. Many took the commissions as license to rebel against the enclosure movement which had cost many rural people their livelihood and traditional communal lands; people began tearing down the hedges and filling in the ditches which had literally enclosed such land from their use. Although the government swiftly put down these popular rebellions, Kett's was a particularly well-armed and organized one; it required a muster of troops to bring it under control. Warwick was one of those who led forces against Kett, who was finally defeated with the loss of 3,000 men, at Ketsfield (otherwise known as Dussindale, E of Norwich). Sometimes described as an engagement in what were "the closest thing Tudor England saw to class war," Kett's Rebellion was motivated by social grievance, and a desire, in Kett's words, for "justice" and "good governance" (Tudor England, p. 208). A yeoman freeholder, Robert Kett, conducted his campaign with a remarkable sense of social responsibility, forbidding his men from violating personal property when they captured Norwich. According to MacCollough, Kett's Rebellion taught the gentry the "frightening lesson [...] that those outside the magisterial class could get on very well without them until confronted with brute force" (qtd. in ibid., p. 210); Muscleborough Musselburgh, just outside Edinburgh, where Protector Somerset defeated the Scots in 1547 at the Battle of Pinkie. Somerset was preoccupied with the conquest of Scotland during much of his time as the power behind the throne, aiming at (among other things) the union of the crowns of England and Scotland and the general subordination of Scotland to England's interests. His major strategy, to build a series of permanent English forts which could enforce England's will in Scotland, was enormously expensive, and not particularly successful.

[10] sword and buckler men men armed with a sword and buckler, a small round shield; fig. bragging, blustering army-men.

[11] prick uncertain, perhaps a vulgar insult (prick = penis); more likely a var. on "princock," an impudent youth, a conceited young fellow.

[12] poking stick also called "a poking iron," a rod used for stiffening the plaits of ruffs. (ruff an article of neck-ware, usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings and standing out all around the neck, worn especially in the reigns of Elizabeth I and James I.)

Will dare to challenge Cutting Dick.[1]
Oh, 'tis a world the world to see,
But 'twill not mend for thee nor me.
By this some guest cries "Ho, the house,"
A fresh friend hath a fresh carouse.
Still he will drink, and still be dry,[2]
And quaff with every company.
Saint Martin[3] send him merry mates
To enter at his hostree[4] gates:
For a blither[5] lad than he Cannot an innkeeper be.

Well, once again farewell, mine host at Rockland: after all these farewells I am sure to Hingham I found a foul way, as before I had done from Thetford to Rockland.

Yet besides the deep way, I was much hindered by the desire people had to see me. For even as our shop-keepers will hail, and pull a man with "Lack ye? what do you lack, gentlemen?" "My ware is best," cries one; "Mine best in England," says another; "Here shall you have choice," sayeth the third. So was the divers voices of the young men and maidens, which I should meet at every mile's end, thronging by twenty, and sometime forty, yea hundreds in a company: one crying the fairest way was through their village; another, "This is the nearest and fairest way, when you have passed but a mile and a half"; another sort cry, "Turn on the left hand," some on the right hand, that I was so amazed, I knew not sometime which way I might best take: but hap hazard, the people still accompanying me, wherewith I was much comforted, though the ways were bad. But as I said before, at last I overtook it.

The Ninth Day's Journey, Being Wednesday of the Fourth Week.

The next morning I left Hingham, not staying till I came to Barford-bridge,[6] five young men running all the way with me, for otherwise my pace was not for footmen.

From Barford-bridge I danced to Norwich.[7] But coming within sight of the city, perceiving so great a multitude and throng of people still crowding more and more about me, mistrusting it would be a let[8] to my determined expedition, and pleasurable humour—which I long before conceived to delight this city with (so far as my best skill, and industry of my long travelled sinews could afford them)—I was advised, and so took ease by that advice, to stay my morris a little above Saint Giles his gate,[9] where I took my gelding, and so rid into the city, procrastinating my merry morris dance through the city till better opportunity.

Being come into the city: Master Roger Weild, the mayor, and sundry other of his worshipful brethren sent for me, who perceiving how I intended not to dance into the city that night, and being well satisfied with the reasons, they allotted me time enough not to dance in till Saturday after; to the end that divers knights and gentlemen, together with their wives and children (who had been many days before deceived with expectation of my coming) might now have sufficient warning, accordingly by Saturday following.

In the mean space, and during my still continuance in the city afterwards, they not only very courteously offered to bear mine own charges[10] and my followers', but very bountifully performed

[1] Cutting Dick Swaggering Dick, "Dick" being used as in the phrase "Every Tom, Dick, and Harry" to denote a common type of man; here, a "cutter" or a swaggering bully; sometimes, a highwayman or cutthroat.

[2] dry thirsty.

[3] Saint Martin Martin of Tours (c. 316-97), traditionally the patron saint of innkeepers.

[4] hostree hostry: a hostelry or inn.

[5] blither merrier.

[6] Barford-bridge Barford, Norfolk, approximately seven miles from Norwich.

[7] Norwich The second most populous city in England at this time, second only to London, Norwich had 15,000 inhabitants by 1603 (Tudor England, pp. 34-35). Norwich is approximately 10 miles NE of Hingham and about 114 miles from London.

[8] let hindrance.

[9] Saint Giles his gate i.e., the gate of Saint Giles.

[10] charges expenses.

it at the common charges.[1] The mayor and many of the aldermen often times besides invited us privately to their several houses.

To make a short end of this tedious description of my entertainment: Saturday no sooner came, but I returned without the city through Saint Giles his gate, and began my morris where I left at that gate, but I entered in at Saint Stephen's gate, where one Thomas Gilbert[2] in name of all the rest of the citizens gave me a friendly and exceeding kind welcome: which I have no reason to omit, unless I would condemn myself of ingratitude, partly for the private affection of the writer towards me; as also for the general love and favour I found in them, from the highest to the lowest, the richest as the poorest. It follows in these few lines:

Master Kemp His Welcome to Norwich[3]

W With heart, and hand, among the rest
E Especially you welcome are:
L Long looked for, as welcome guest,
C Come now at last you be from far.
O Of most within the city sure,
M Many good wishes you have had.
E Each one did pray you might endure,
W With courage good the match you made.
I Intend they did with gladsome hearts,
L Like your well-willers, you to meet:
K Know you also they'll do their parts,
E Either in field or house to greet
M More you than any with you came,
P Procured thereto with trump[4] and fame.

Your well-willer,
T.G.

Passing the gate, wifflers[5] (such officers as were appointed by the mayor) to make me way through the throng of the people, which pressed so mightily upon me: with great labour I got through that narrow preaze[6] into the open marketplace. Where on the cross, ready prepared, stood the city waits,[7] which not a little refreshed my weariness with toiling through so narrow a lane, as the people left me: such waits (under benedicite[8] be it spoken) few cities in our realm have the like, none better. Who, besides their excellency in wind instruments, their rare cunning on the viol and violin: their voices be admirable, every one of them able to serve in any cathedral church in Christendom for quiristers.[9]

Passing by the marketplace, the press still increasing by the number of boys, girls, men and women, thronging more and more before me to see the end, it was the mischance of a homely[10] maid, that belike was but newly crept into the fashion of long-waisted petticoats tied with points,[11] and had, as it seemed, but one point tied before, and coming unluckily in my way, as I was fetching a leap, it fell out that I set my foot on her

[1] performed it at the common charges perhaps, reimbursed them at the common rate of payment for such entertainment; perhaps, simply that the mayor and his aldermen paid Kemp and his fellows' expenses out of the town's public budget.

[2] Thomas Gilbert Norwich bookseller and bookbinder (active, 1559-1603). See "Thomas Gilbert," The Norwich Book Trades before 1800, by D. Stoker (Cambridge Bibliographical Society, 1981), vol. 8, part 1, p. 83. Although Gilbert does not seem to have held civic office, his family was clearly respectable: there are two Gilberts in J. L'Estrange's Calendar of the Freemen of Norwich from 1317 to 1603, ed. W. Rye (London, 1888); one a weaver, the other a grocer (p. 59).

[3] Master Kemp His Welcome to Norwich an acrostic poem, one where the first letter of each line spells out a word when read from top to bottom.

[4] trump trumpet.

[5] wifflers not in OED; the context suggests officers who clear the way for a procession.

[6] preaze press; space.

[7] Where on the cross, ready prepared, stood the city waits "waits" wind-instrumentalists maintained by a city or town at the public charge, to play at festive or ceremonial occasions; here, they are gathered at the market-cross, that stood at the centre of most towns and villages in the period, marking the community's main meeting place.

[8] under benedicite Latin, "under the invocation of a blessing."

[9] quiristers i.e., choristers, members of a choir.

[10] homely unsophisticated, simple, unpolished.

[11] long-waisted petticoats tied with points in this case, an outer skirt, attached to the bodice of the garment with a set of laces (or "points").

skirts. The point either breaking or stretching, off fell her petticoat from her waist, but as chance was, though her smock[1] were coarse, it was cleanly. Yet the poor wench was so ashamed, the rather for that she could hardly recover her coat[2] again from unruly boys, that looking before like one that had the green sickness,[3] now had she her cheeks all coloured with scarlet. I was sorry for her, but on I went towards the mayor's, and deceived the people by leaping over the churchyard wall at St John's, getting so into Master Mayor's gates a nearer way. But at last I found it the further way about, being forced on the Tuesday following to renew my former dance, because George Sprat, my overseer, having lost me in the throng, would not be deposed that I had danced it, since he saw me not. And I must confess I did not well, for the citizens had caused all the turnpikes[4] to be taken up on Saturday that I might not be hindered. But now I return again to my jump, the measure of which is to be seen in the guild-hall at Norwich, where my buskins, that I then wore and danced in from London thither, stand equally divided, nailed on the wall.[5] The plenty of good cheer at the mayor's, his bounty and kind usage, together with the general welcomes of his worshipful brethren, and many other knights, ladies, gentlemen and gentlewomen, so much exceeded my expectation, as I adjudged myself most bound to them all. The mayor gave me five pound in Elsabeth angels:[6] which mayor (fair madam, to whom I too presumptuously dedicate my idle paces) is a man worthy of a singular and impartial admiration, if our critic, humorous[7] minds could as prodigally conceive as he deserves, for his chaste life, liberality, and temperance in possessing worldly benefits. He lives unmarried, and childless, never purchased house nor land, the house he dwells in this year being but hired. He lives upon merchandise, being a merchant venturer. If our merchants and gentlemen would take example by this man, gentlemen would not sell their lands to become bankrupt merchants, nor merchants live in the possessions of youth-beguiled gentlemen, who cast themselves out of their parent's heritages for a few outcast[8] commodities. But wit whither wilt thou? What hath morris-tripping Will to do with that? It keeps not time with his dance; therefore, room, you moral precepts; give my legs leave to end my morris, or that being ended, my hands leave to perfect this worthless, poor, tattered volume.

Pardon me, madam, that I am thus tedious. I cannot choose but commend sacred liberality, which makes poor wretches partakers of all comfortable benefits. Besides the love and favour already repeated, Master Weild, the mayor, gave me 40 shillings yearly during my life, making me a freeman of the Merchant Venturers,[9] this is the substance of all my journey. Therefore let no man believe, however before by lying ballads and rumors they have been abused, that either ways were laid open for me, or that I delivered gifts to her Majesty. It is good being merry, my masters, but in a mean,[10] and all my mirths (mean[11] though they be) have been and ever shall be employed to the delight of my royal Mistress, whose sacred name ought not to be remembered among such ribald rhymes, as these late, thin-breeched,[12] lying ballad-singers have proclaimed it.

---

1 smock undergarment; shift or chemise.

2 coat i.e., petticoat.

3 green sickness i.e., she was initially very pale before she blushed red with embarrassment. Green sickness, also known as the virgin's disease, was a type of severe anemia which afflicted young, unmarried women; its symptoms included pallor, unusual cravings, and a tendency to faint.

4 turnpikes barriers set up to exclude horse-traffic from a foot-way.

5 According to Wiles, this prodigious jump is now memorialized in Norwich, with a plaque on the wall of St John Maddermarket (Shakespeare's Clowns, p. 24), but if there was a plaque dating from 1600 it does not appear to have survived.

6 Elsabeth angels i.e., Elizabeth angels; an "angel" was a gold coin worth approximately 10 shillings.

7 humorous fanciful, whimsical; not grounded in reason.

8 outcast rejected, discarded.

9 making me a freeman of the Merchant Venturers Kemp is granted all the privileges of the highest-ranking member (the freeman) of the company of the Merchant Adventurers.

10 mean a comfortable median.

11 mean lowly, base.

12 thin-breeched i.e., so poor that their breeches are becoming worn through.

It resteth now that in a word I show what profit I have made by my morris. True it is I put out some money to have threefold gain at my return; some that love me, regard my pains, and respect their promise have sent home the treble worth; some other at the first sight have paid me, if I came to seek them; others I cannot see, nor will they willingly be found, and these are the greater number.[1] If they had all used me well, or all ill, I would have boldly set down the true sum of my small gain or loss, but I will have patience some few days longer. At the end of which time, if any be behind, I will draw a catalogue of all their names I ventured with. Those that have shown themselves honest men, I will set before them this character "H" for "Honesty"; before the other bench-whistlers[2] shall stand "K" for "Kettlers" and "Keistrels,"[3] that will drive a good companion without need in them to contend for his own. But I hope I shall have no such need. If I have, your honourable protection shall thus far defend your poor servant that he may, being a plain man, call a spade a spade.[4] Thus fearing your ladyship is wearier with reading this toy[5] than I was in all my merry travail, I crave pardon: and conclude this first pamphlet that ever Will Kemp offered to the press, being thereunto pressed on the one side by the pitiful papers pasted on every post, of that which was neither so nor so, and on the other side urged thereto in duty to express with thankfulness the kind entertainment I found.

Your Honour's poor servant.

W.K.

Kemp's Humble Request to the Impudent Generation of Ballad-Makers and Their Coherents; That It Would Please Their Rascalities to Pity His Pains in the Great Journey He Pretends,[6] and Not Fill the Country with Lies of his Never-Done Acts as They Did in His Late Morris to Norwich.

To the Tune of
"Thomas Deloney's Epitaph"[7]

My notable shakerags,[8] the effect of my suit[9] is discovered in the title of my supplication. But for your better understandings (for that I know you to be a sort of witless beetle-heads that can understand nothing, but what is knocked into your scalps), these are by these presents[10] to certify unto your block-headships, that I, William Kemp —whom you had near hand rent in sunder[11] with your unreasonable rhymes, am shortly (God willing) to set forward as merrily as I may: whither, I myself know not. Wherefore by the way I would wish ye employ not your little wits in certifying the world that I am gone to Rome, Jerusalem, or Venice, or any other place at your idle appoint.[12] I know the best of ye by the lies ye writ of me got not the price of a good hat to cover your brainless heads. If any of ye had come to me, my bounty should have exceeded the best of your good masters, the ballad-buyers. I would have apparelled your dry pates in parti-coloured bonnets,[13] and bestowed a leash of my

[1] Wiles suggests that part of the motivation behind the pamphlet is to notify those who accepted Kemp's wager that he has completed the dance and they are now bound to pay him what they owe (Shakespeare's Clowns, p. 25). See p. 1046, note 4.

[2] bench-whistler an idler who sits whistling on a bench.

[3] Kettler one who mends or repairs kettles; a tinker; more generally, a vagrant; Keistrel a type of hawk famous for being able to hover in the air above its prey before diving in for the kill; when applied to persons, a contemptuous label.

[4] call a spade a spade A proverb meaning to call things by their true names without polite euphemisms; to be blunt and straightforward to the point of being rude (Tilley S699).

[5] toy a fantastic or frivolous piece of writing; an idle tale or funny story.

[6] Pretends plans, intends.

[7] "Thomas Deloney's Epitaph" not listed in STC or Livingston, British Broadside Ballads of the Sixteenth Century (New York, 1991).

[8] shakerags ragged, disreputable persons; but see p. 1055, note 10.

[9] suit petition, supplication, entreaty.

[10] these presents i.e., the present document or writing; these words or statements: used in a document to denote the document itself; most commonly used in legal or legislative documents in the sixteenth century.

[11] near hand rent in sunder almost torn to pieces.

[12] appoint agreement, settlement.

[13] dry pates in parti-coloured bonnets empty heads (barren brains) in hats, partly of one colour, partly of another.

cast bells[1] to have crowned ye with coxcombs.[2] I have made a privy search, what private jigmonger of your jolly number hath been the author of these abominable ballads written of me. I was told it was the great ballad-maker T.D. alias Thomas Deloney, chronicler of the memorable lives of the six yeomen of the west, Jack of Newbury, the Gentle-craft, and such like honest men,[3] omitted by Stow, Holinshed, Grafton, Hall, Froissart, and the rest of those well-deserving writers.[4] But I was given since to understand, your late general Thomas died poorly, as ye all must do, and was honestly[5] buried, which is much to be doubted of some of you. The quest of inquiry finding him by death acquitted of the inditement, I was let to wit[6] that another lord of little wit, one whose employment for the pageant was utterly spent, he being known to be Elderton's immediate heir,[7] was vehemently suspected. But after due inquisition was made, he was at that time known to live like a man in a mist, having quite given over the mystery.[8] Still the search continuing, I met a proper upright youth, only for a little stooping in the shoulders, all heart to the heel, a penny poet whose first making[9] was the miserable stolen story of Macdoel, or Macdobeth, or Macsomewhat:[10] for I am sure a Mac it was, though I never had the maw[11] to see it. And he told me there was a fat, filthy ballad-maker that should have once been his journeyman to the trade, who lived about the town, and ten to one, but he had thus terribly abused me and my taborer, for that he was able to do such a thing in print.

A shrewd presumption: I found him about the Bankside, sitting at a play.[12] I desired to speak with him, had him to a tavern, charged a pipe with tobacco, and then laid this terrible accusation to his charge. He swells presently like one of the four winds, the violence of his breath blew the tobacco out of the pipe, and the heat of his wrath drunk dry two bowlfulls of Rhenish wine. At length having power to speak: "Name my accuser," saith he, "or I defy thee, Kemp, at the quart staff."[13] I

---

[1] cast bells probably, simply bells made through the process of melting metal into a mould; perhaps, though, "cast" as an adjective: thus, his cast-off or discarded morris bells. See p. 1042, note 4.

[2] coxcomb a cap worn by a professional fool, like a cock's comb in shape and colour.

[3] These are all references to books and pamphlets by the popular writer and balladeer, Thomas Deloney (d. in or before 1600). Although a silk weaver by trade, by the early 1590s he had produced a welter of enormously popular ballads, some on contemporary events, such as terrible fires and notorious murders. His most famous works, referred to here, are Thomas of Reading, or The Six Worthy Yeoman of the West (entered in Stationers' Register, 1602), Jack of Newbury (ent. SR, 1597), and The Gentle Craft (1597-98). For more information, see Deloney's entry in this anthology, pp. 1238-69, and the additional online texts.

[4] These are all writers of chronicles or histories: John Stow (1524/25-1605), historian and antiquarian, author of Chronicles of England (1580), Annals of England (1592), and A Survey of London (1598); Raphael Holinshed (c. 1525-?1580), author of Chronicles of England, Scotland and Ireland (1577); Edward Hall (1498-1547), author of The Union of the Two Noble and Illustrious Families of Lancaster and York (1548); Jean Froissart (c. 1337-1410), author of a history of England and France between 1325-1400 (trans. Lord Berners, 1523-25).

[5] honestly decently, respectably.

[6] let to wit given to understand.

[7] one whose employment for the pageant was utterly spent, he being known to be Elderton's immediate heir Anthony Munday (1560-1633), dramatist and translator, was responsible for writing and producing the lord mayors' pageants and other official dramatic productions for the city of London. William Elderton (d. in or before 1592) was acknowledged by contemporaries such as Gabriel Harvey and Thomas Nashe as "the father of ballad writers" (E. Goldring, "William Elderton," DNB online, 2005).

[8] mystery art, trade.

[9] making poem, composition.

[10] I met a proper upright youth … or Macdobeth, or Macsomewhat Kemp's reference to the ballad-makers as "shakerags" and his recent departure from the King's Men open the possibility that he is engaging in a thinly-veiled attack on his former colleague, William Shakespeare, although the latter's tragedy Macbeth dates only to around 1606-1607. Wiles suggests that the reference may be more general, referring not to Shakespeare specifically but to the "stage [...] as the scene of the ballad-maker's attacks on [Kemp]" (Shakespeare's Clowns, p. 25).

[11] maw inclination.

[12] the Bankside, sitting at a play that disreputable district located outside of London's walls on the south bank of the Thames, famous for its playhouses, brothels, and taverns.

[13] defy thee … at the quart staff i.e., challenge thee ... to a battle using quarter-staves; a quarter staff was a stout pole, from six to eight feet long and tipped with iron, formerly used as a weapon by the English peasantry.

told him, and all his anger turned to laughter, swearing it did him good to have ill words of a hoddy doddy, a habber de hoy,[1] a chicken, a squib, a squall:[2] one that hath not wit enough to make a ballad, that by Pol and Aedipol[3] would pol his father, derick[4] his dad, do anything how ill soever to please his apish humour.[5] I hardly believed this youth that I took to be gracious had been so graceless. But I heard afterwards his mother-in-law was eye and ear witness of his father's abuse by this blessed child on a public stage, in a merry host of an inn's part. Yet all this while could I not find out the true ballad-maker. Till by chance a friend of mine pulled out of his pocket a book in Latin called Mundus Furiosus, printed at Cullen, written by one of the vilest and arrantest lying cullions[6] that ever writ book, his name Jansonius,[7] who taking upon him to write an abstract of all the turbulent actions that had been lately attempted or performed in Christendom, like an unChristian wretch writes only by report,[8] partially, and scoffingly of such whose pages's shoes he was unworthy to wipe, for indeed he is now dead. Farewell he; every dog must have a day.[9] But see the luck on't: this beggarly, lying, busy-body's name brought out the ballad-maker, and it was generally confirmed it was his kinsman. He confesses himself guilty; let any man look on his face: if there be not so red a colour that all the soap in the town will not wash white, let me be turned to a whiting[10] as I pass between Dover and Calais. Well, God forgive thee, honest fellow. I see thou hast grace in thee: I prithee, do so no more; leave writing these beastly ballads; make not good wenches prophetesses for little or no profit,[11] nor for a six-penny matter revive not a poor fellow's fault that's hanged for his offence: it may be thine own destiny one day;[12] prithee, be good to them. Call up thy old Melpomene,[13] whose strawberry quill may write the bloody lines of the Blue Lady, and the Prince of the Burning Crown: a better subject I can tell ye than your Knight of the Red Cross.[14] So farewell, and cross me no more, I prithee, with thy rabble

[1] hoddy doddy simpleton; habber de hoy variation of hobbledehoy: a young, clumsy, or awkward person.

[2] squib a firework, which has a small, pathetic blast; when applied to persons: a mean or insignificant fellow; squall of obscure origin; a small or insignificant person.

[3] by Pol and Aedipol i.e., by Pollux, one of the founders of Rome, and by Heaven. Towards the end of the sixteenth century, these Latin "oaths" were condemned along with those that referred to the Christian God (directly or euphemistically, as in the exclamation "By cock" for "By God"), the parts of Christ's body, and the Catholic mass. See Norman Jones, The English Reformation: Religion and Cultural Adaptation (Oxford, 2002), pp. 166-67.

[4] pol plunder, rob; derick hang.

[5] apish fantastically foolish; humour dominant disposition.

[6] arrantest most notorious or downright; cullions rascals.

[7] Jansonius according to Wiles, probably Robert Johnson, author of the burlesque narrative Tom-a-Lincoln, the Red-Rose Knight (ent. SR, 1599) (Shakespeare's Clowns, pp. 25-26). The book is Mundi Furiosi sive P. A. Iansonii Narra[tio]nis Rerum Tota Europa Gestarum, Continuatio ab Anno 1597 usque ad annum praesentem 1600 ("The Mad World by P.A. Jansonius. A Relation of the Affairs and Deeds of All Europe, Continuing from the Year 1597 Right up until the Present Year 1600"; Coloniae [Cologne], 1600).

[8] by report on the basis of rumour, talk.

[9] every dog must have a day Proverb: "All persons, no matter of what class, rank or character, will have an opportunity to revenge themselves against those that have injured them" (Tilley D464).

[10] whiting a small white-fleshed fish abundant off the coast of England.

[11] make not good wenches prophetesses for little or no profit a reference to ballad-makers' tendency to seize on all sorts of sensational events for profit, such as the prophetic and visionary utterances of particular women; perhaps a reference to the ballads written about the Holy Maid of Kent (Elizabeth Barton [c. 1506-34]).

[12] nor for a six-penny matter … destiny one day This plea is made in a less tongue-in-cheek way in the preface to several pamphlets which recount contemporary tales of murder and punishment; see "A Brief Discourse of the Late Murder of Master George Saunders," ll. 545-46.

[13] Melpomene the muse of tragedy, whom Kemp satirically assigns to his rivals as the inspiration for the only kinds of "tragedies" that they are capable of writing—tales of outlandish romance and adventure.

[14] whose strawberry quill … Knight of the Red Cross By describing himself as having been written about under the guise of the Red Cross Knight, Kemp implies that he has been satirized in Johnson's romance burlesque, Tom-a-Lincoln. As Wiles points out, this work offers a hero who is "the bastard son of King Arthur, is elected as a Summer Lord of Misrule ... [and] distributes red roses as his livery badges to young men" (p. 26). In the course of the narrative he "becomes a knight errant, journeys with Sir Launcelot, and is seduced by the queen of fairyland" (p. 26). Clearly, Kemp would be sensitive to satiric comparisons between his nine days' wonder and the "fantastic journey" of Tom-a-Lincoln (Shakespeare's Clowns, pp. 26-27).

of bald rhymes, lest at my return I set a cross on thy forehead, that all men may know thee for a fool.

FINIS.

William Kemp.

—1600

William Shakespeare
1564-1616

Despite Shakespeare's reputation as one of England's most famous poets and playwrights, there is very little information available on which to base an outline of his life. Outside of the plays and poems, there are no personal letters or diaries, and only a few court documents. Shakespeare's parents were solid land-owning citizens, and his father John participated in local politics, becoming bailiff—similar to a mayor—for a few years beginning in 1567. Shakespeare was born in Stratford, and baptized on 26 April 1564; since the practice was to baptize children a few days after birth, his birth date is conventionally set on 23 April, the same day which celebrates St. George, England's patron saint (Shakespeare died on 23 April 1616). Shakespeare probably attended the local King's New School, and would have studied Latin and many classical texts, whose influences are seen in his writings. A bitter taunt by rival playwright Robert Greene informs us that Shakespeare was in London and a playwright by 1592; Greene calls him an "upstart crow."

Shakespeare continued writing plays until approximately 1613, when he "retired" to "New Place," the second largest house in Stratford (he was both playwright and businessman, and had invested in the theatre in London and in property around Stratford). During the period 1592-94, a plague in London closed the theatres, and it was at this time that he wrote the erotic narrative poem Venus and Adonis, the story of which appears in Ovid's Metamorphoses, although in a very different guise. Shakespeare's version of events is influenced by the conventions of Petrarchan poetry; however, rather than a male lover pleading endlessly to a disdainful mistress, Shakespeare envisions a lusty and knowing mistress attempting to seduce a prudish young man. The effect is not simply comic, however, but opens the poem to questions of sexuality, desire, and gender. Venus and Adonis was one of Shakespeare's most popular works and went through nine editions in his lifetime, sixteen by 1640. The sonnets may have been started in 1592 also, though there is some evidence that Shakespeare continued to write and revise them well into the 1600s. The sonnets were published in 1609, without Shakespeare's authorization, and two of them (numbers 138 and 144) appeared in The Passionate Pilgrim, a collection of verse published around 1599. The sonnet sequence was a popular genre at the time—Sir Philip Sidney, Edmund Spenser, and Samuel Daniel all contributed to it—and followed the conventions of the Italian Petrarch's sequence, though many English writers played with these conventions. (The sonnet structure of three quatrains followed by a couplet was not Shakespeare's invention, although it was later named after him.) Because the sonnet sequence is so formulaic, it is not really a trustworthy source for real emotional or biographical information, though the sonnets have raised many speculations about Shakespeare's personal life, especially since the speaker identifies himself as "Will" in sonnet 135. Who was the young man so adored by the speaker in the first 126 sonnets, and who was the woman—often called "the dark lady"—who threw the speaker into such a state of chaos in the remaining sonnets? The sonnets cover a myriad of emotional states surrounding these two relationships, but they also discuss matters of time, mortality, and immortality, along with artistic creativity and the act of writing itself.

EDITIONS: Venus and Adonis. London: Imprinted by Richard Field and are to be sold [by J. Harrison], 1593. STC 22354; Shakespeares sonnets Never before imprinted. London: By G. Eld for T[homas] T[horpe] and are to be sold by William Aspley, 1609. STC 22353.

Venus and Adonis

Vilia miretur vulgus; mihi flavus Apollo
Pocula Castalia plena ministret aqua.[1]

To the Right Honourable Henry Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and Baron of Titchfield.

Right Honourable, I know not how I shall offend in dedicating my unpolished lines to your lordship, nor how the world will censure me for choosing so strong a prop to support so weak a burthen, only if your honour seem but pleased, I account myself highly praised, and vow to take advantage of all idle hours, till I have honoured you with some graver labour. But if the first heir of my invention[2] prove deformed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a godfather, and never after ear[3] so barren a land, for fear it yield me still so bad a harvest. I leave it to your honourable survey, and your Honour to your heart's content, which I wish may always answer your own wish and the world's hopeful expectation.

Your Honour's in all duty,
William Shakespeare.

Even as the sun with purple-coloured face,
Had ta'en his last leave of the weeping morn,
Rose-cheeked Adonis hied[4] him to the chase,
Hunting he loved, but love he laughed to scorn.
Sick-thoughted Venus makes amain[5] unto him,
And like a bold-faced suitor 'gins to woo him.

"Thrice fairer than myself," thus she began,
"The field's chief flower, sweet above compare,
Stain to all nymphs,[6] more lovely than a man,
More white, and red, than doves or roses are:
Nature that made thee with herself at strife,[7]
Saith that the world hath ending with thy life.

"Vouchsafe thou wonder to alight thy steed,
And rein his proud head to the saddle bow,
If thou wilt deign this favour, for thy meed[8]
A thousand honey secrets shalt thou know.
Here come and sit where never serpent hisses,
And being set, I'll smother thee with kisses.

"And yet not cloy thy lips with loathed satiety,
But rather famish them amid their plenty,
Making them red, and pale, with fresh variety:
Ten kisses short as one, one long as twenty.
A summer's day will seem an hour but short,
Being wasted in such time-beguiling sport."

With this she seizeth on his sweating palm,
The precedent[9] of pith and livelihood,
And trembling in her passion, calls it balm,
Earth's sovereign salve, to do a goddess good.
Being so enraged, desire doth lend her force,
Courageously to pluck him from his horse.

Over one arm the lusty courser's rein,
Under her other was the tender boy,
Who blushed and pouted in a dull disdain,
With leaden appetite, unapt to toy.
She red and hot as coals of glowing fire,
He red for shame, but frosty in desire.

The studded bridle on a ragged bough
Nimbly she fastens (Oh how quick is love!),
The steed is stallèd up,[10] and even now

---

[1] from Ovid's Amores,
"Let base-conceited wits admire vile things,
Fair Phoebus lead me to the Muses' springs" (Marlowe's translation).

[2] first heir of my invention Venus and Adonis was Shakespeare's first published work.

[3] ear cultivate, plant.

[4] hied hurried.

[5] Sick-thoughted love sick; makes amain speeds.

[6] Stain to all nymphs i.e., stains their beauty in comparison to his.

[7] that made thee with herself at strife striving to outdo herself.

[8] meed reward, but with a play on mead or "honey" of next line.

[9] precedent sign.

[10] stallèd up as in a stall

To tie the rider she begins to prove:[1]
Backward she pushed him, as she would be thrust,
And governed him in strength, though not in lust.

So soon was she along, as he was down,
Each leaning on their elbows and their hips;
Now doth she stroke his cheek, now doth he frown,
And 'gins to chide, but soon she stops his lips,
And kissing speaks, with lustful language broken,
"If thou wilt chide, thy lips shall never open."

He burns in baleful shame; she with her tears
Doth quench the maiden burning of his cheeks,
Then with her windy sighs, and golden hairs,
To fan and blow them dry again she seeks.
He saith, she is immodest, blames her miss,[2]
What follows more, she murders with a kiss.

Even as an empty eagle, sharp by fast,[3]
Tires[4] with her beak on feathers, flesh, and bone,
Shaking her wings, devouring all in haste,
Till either gorge[5] be stuffed, or prey be gone,
Even so she kissed his brow, his cheek, his chin,
And where she ends, she doth anew begin.

Forced to content,[6] but never to obey,
Panting he lies, and breatheth in her face.
She feedeth on the steam, as on a prey,
And calls it heavenly moisture, air of grace,
Wishing her cheeks were gardens full of flowers,
So they were dewed with such distilling showers.

Look how a bird lies tangled in a net,
So fastened in her arms Adonis lies,
Pure shame and awed resistance made him fret,
Which bred more beauty in his angry eyes.
Rain added to a river that is rank,[7]
Perforce will force it overflow the bank.

Still she entreats, and prettily entreats,
For to a pretty ear she tunes her tale.
Still is he sullen, still he lours and frets,
'Twixt crimson shame, and anger ashy pale.
Being red she loves him best, and being white,
Her best is bettered with a more delight.

Look how he can, she cannot choose but love,
And by her fair immortal hand she swears,
From his soft bosom never to remove,
Till he take truce[8] with her contending tears,
Which long have rained, making her cheeks all wet,
And one sweet kiss shall pay this comptless[9] debt.

Upon this promise did he raise his chin,
Like a divedapper[10] peering through a wave,
Who, being looked on, ducks as quickly in:
So offers he to give what she did crave.
But when her lips were ready for his pay,
He winks, and turns his lips another way.

Never did passenger in summer's heat,
More thirst for drink than she for this good turn,
Her help she sees, but help she cannot get,
She bathes in water, yet her fire must burn:
"Oh pity," gan she cry, "flint-hearted boy,
'Tis but a kiss I beg. Why art thou coy?

"I have been wooed as I entreat thee now,
Even by the stern and direful god of war,
Whose sinewy neck in battle ne'er did bow,

[1] prove try.
[2] miss fault.
[3] sharp by fast hungry through fasting.
[4] Tires tears.
[5] gorge stomach or gut.
[6] to content to content her, to submit.
[7] rank full, strong.
[8] take truce make peace.
[9] comptless beyond counting.
[10] divedapper small diving water fowl.

Who conquers where he comes in every jar.[1]
Yet hath he been my captive and my slave,
And begged for that which thou unasked shalt have.

"Over my altars hath he hung his lance,
His battered shield, his uncontrolled crest,
And for my sake hath learned to sport and dance,
To toy, to wanton, dally, smile and jest,
Scorning his churlish drum, and ensign[2] red,
Making my arms his field, his tent my bed.

"Thus he that over-ruled, I over-swayed,
Leading him prisoner in a red rose chain.
Strong-tempered steel his stronger strength obeyed,
Yet was he servile to my coy disdain.
Oh be not proud, nor brag not of thy might,
For mast'ring her that foiled[3] the god of fight.

"Touch but my lips with those fair lips of thine,
Though mine be not so fair, yet are they red,
The kiss shall be thine own as well as mine.
What seest thou in the ground? Hold up thy head,
Look in mine eyeballs, there thy beauty lies.
Then why not lips on lips, since eyes in eyes?

"Art thou ashamed to kiss? Then wink again,
And I will wink; so shall the day seem night.
Love keeps his revels where there are but twain:
Be bold to play, our sport is not in sight.[4]
These blue-veined violets whereon we lean
Never can blab, nor know not what we mean.

"The tender spring upon thy tempting lip
Shows thee unripe; yet mayst thou well be tasted.
Make use of time; let not advantage slip,
Beauty within itself should not be wasted.
Fair flowers that are not gathered in their prime,
Rot and consume themselves in little time.

"Were I hard-favoured, foul or wrinkled old,
Ill-nurtured, crooked, churlish, harsh in voice,
O'er-worn, despised, rheumatic and cold,
Thick-sighted,[5] barren, lean and lacking juice,
Then mightst thou pause, for then I were not for thee,
But having no defects, why dost abhor me?

"Thou canst not see one wrinkle in my brow,
Mine eyes are grey and bright and quick in turning,
My beauty as the spring doth yearly grow,
My flesh is soft and plump, my marrow burning,
My smooth moist hand,[6] were it with thy hand felt,
Would in thy palm dissolve or seem to melt.

"Bid me discourse, I will enchant thine ear,
Or like a fairy, trip upon the green,
Or like a nymph, with long dishevelled hair,
Dance on the sands, and yet no footing[7] seen.
Love is a spirit all compact of fire,
Not gross to sink, but light, and will aspire.

"Witness this primrose bank whereon I lie,
These forceless[8] flowers like sturdy trees support me:
Two strengthless doves will draw me through the sky
From morn till night, even where I list to sport me.
Is love so light, sweet boy, and may it be,
That thou should think it heavy unto thee?

---

[1] jar discord, conflict.
[2] ensign banner.
[3] foiled overthrew, defeated.
[4] not in sight not seen.
[5] Thick-sighted dim-sighted.
[6] moist hand A moist hand often denoted passion.
[7] footing footprint.
[8] forceless fragile or weak; the idea is that as a goddess, Venus is airy light, and can be supported by delicate flower stems, and—in the next sentence—can be drawn by "strengthless" or weak doves.

"Is thine own heart to thine own face affected?[1]
Can thy right hand seize love upon thy left?
Then woo thyself, be of thyself rejected:
Steal thine own freedom and complain on theft.
Narcissus so himself himself forsook,
And died to kiss his shadow in the brook.

"Torches are made to light, jewels to wear,
Dainties[2] to taste, fresh beauty for the use,
Herbs for their smell and sappy plants to bear.
Things growing to themselves are growth's abuse,
Seeds spring from seeds and beauty breedeth beauty,
Thou wast begot; to get[3] it is thy duty.

"Upon the earth's increase why shouldst thou feed,
Unless the earth with thy increase be fed?
By law of nature thou art bound to breed,
That thine may live, when thou thyself art dead.
And so in spite of death thou dost survive,
In that thy likeness still is left alive."

By this[4] the love-sick queen began to sweat,
For where they lay the shadow had forsook them,
And Titan,[5] tired in the midday heat,
With burning eye did hotly overlook them,
Wishing Adonis had his team[6] to guide,
So he were like him, and by Venus' side.

And now Adonis, with a lazy sprite,[7]
And with a heavy, dark, disliking eye,
His louring brows o'er-whelming his fair sight,
Like misty vapours when they blot the sky,
Souring his cheeks, cries, "Fie, no more of love.
The sun doth burn my face; I must remove."

"Ay, me," quoth Venus, "young, and so unkind,
What bare excuses mak'st thou to be gone?
I'll sigh celestial breath, whose gentle wind
Shall cool the heat of this descending sun.
I'll make a shadow for thee of my hairs,
If they burn too, I'll quench them with my tears.

"The sun that shines from heaven, shines but warm,
And lo, I lie between that sun and thee.
The heat I have from thence doth little harm,
Thine eye darts forth the fire that burneth me,
And were I not immortal, life were done,[8]
Between this heavenly and earthly sun.

"Art thou obdurate, flinty, hard as steel?
Nay more than flint, for stone at rain relenteth.[9]
Art thou a woman's son and canst not feel
What 'tis to love, how want of love tormenteth?
Oh had thy mother borne so hard a mind,
She had not brought forth thee, but died unkind.

"What am I that thou shouldst contemn me this?[10]
Or what great danger dwells upon my suit?
What were thy lips the worse for one poor kiss?
Speak fair, but speak fair words, or else be mute:
Give me one kiss, I'll give it thee again,
And one for int'rest, if thou wilt have twain.

"Fie, lifeless picture, cold and senseless stone,
Well-painted idol, image dull and dead,
Statue contenting but the eye alone,
Thing like a man, but of no woman bred:
Thou art no man, though of a man's complexion,
For men will kiss even by their own direction."

---

[1] Is thine … affected? i.e., Are you in love with yourself?
[2] Dainties delicacies.
[3] to get to beget more beauty (by having children); this echoes the sentiment of the early sonnets.
[4] By this by this time.
[5] Titan sun god.
[6] his team his horses, which drew the sun chariot across the sky.
[7] sprite spirit.
[8] done ended.
[9] stone at rain relenteth Stone is worn down by the rain.
[10] this like this.

This said, impatience chokes her pleading tongue,
And swelling passion doth provoke a pause,
Red cheeks and fiery eyes blaze forth her wrong:
Being judge in love, she cannot right her cause.[1]
And now she weeps, and now she fain would speak,
And now her sobs do her intendments[2] break.

Sometime she shakes her head, and then his hand,
Now gazeth she on him, now on the ground,
Sometime her arms enfold him like a band,
She would, he will not in her arms be bound:
And when from thence he struggles to be gone,
She locks her lily fingers one in one.

"Fondling," she saith, "since I have hemmed thee here
Within the circuit of this ivory pale,[3]
I'll be a park, and thou shalt be my deer:
Feed where thou wilt, on mountain or in dale;
Graze on my lips, and if those hills be dry,
Stray lower, where the pleasant fountains lie.

"Within this limit is relief enough,
Sweet bottom grass and high delightful plain,
Round rising hillocks, brakes[4] obscure and rough,
To shelter thee from tempest and from rain:
Then be my deer, since I am such a park,
No dog shall rouse thee, though a thousand bark."

At this Adonis smiles as in disdain,
That in each cheek appears a pretty dimple.
Love made those hollows, if[5] himself were slain,
He might be buried in a tomb so simple,
Foreknowing well, if there he came to lie,
Why there love lived, and there he could not die.

These lovely caves, these round enchanting pits,
Opened their mouths to swallow Venus' liking:
Being mad before, how doth she now for wits?
Struck dead at first, what needs a second striking?
Poor queen of love, in thine own law forlorn,
To love a cheek that smiles at thee in scorn.

Now which way shall she turn? What shall she say?
Her words are done, her woes the more increasing,
The time is spent, her object will away,
And from her twining arms doth urge releasing.
"Pity," she cries, "some favour, some remorse."
Away he springs and hasteth to his horse.

But lo, from forth a copse[6] that neighbours by,
A breeding jennet,[7] lusty, young and proud,
Adonis' trampling courser[8] doth espy,
And forth she rushes, snorts and neighs aloud.
The strong-necked steed, being tied unto a tree,
Breaketh his rein and to her straight goes he.

Imperiously he leaps, he neighs, he bounds,
And now his woven girths he breaks asunder,
The bearing earth[9] with his hard hoof he wounds,
Whose hollow womb resounds like heaven's thunder,
The iron bit he crusheth 'tween his teeth,
Controlling what he was controllèd with.

His ears up-pricked, his braided hanging mane
Upon his compassed crest[10] now stand on end,
His nostrils drink the air, and forth again
As from a furnace, vapours doth he send.
His eye, which scornfully glisters like fire,
Shows his hot courage and his high desire.

---

[1] Being … cause i.e., even though she is love's judge, she cannot win her campaign.
[2] intendments intents; desire to speak.
[3] pale fence, with a play on "ivory."
[4] brakes thickets.
[5] if so that if.
[6] copse thicket of small trees, or underwood.
[7] breeding jennet small Spanish mare.
[8] courser stallion.
[9] bearing earth load-bearing, but continuing the birth imagery of the passage also.
[10] compassed crest curved mane or neck.

Sometime he trots, as if he told[1] the steps,
With gentle majesty and modest pride,
Anon he rears upright, curvets[2] and leaps,
As who should say, "Lo thus my strength is tried.
And this I do to captivate the eye
Of the fair breeder that is standing by."

What recketh he his rider's angry stir,
His flattering "Holla,"[3] or his "Stand, I say"?
What cares he now for curb or pricking spur,
For rich caparisons[4] or trappings gay?
He sees his love, and nothing else he sees,
For nothing else with his proud sight agrees.

Look when[5] a painter would surpass the life
In limning out[6] a well-proportioned steed,
His art with nature's workmanship at strife,
As if the dead the living should exceed:
So did this horse excel a common one
In shape, in courage, colour, pace and bone.

Round-hoofed, short-jointed, fetlocks shag and long,
Broad breast, full eye, small head and nostril wide,
High crest, short ears, straight legs and passing strong,
Thin mane, thick tail, broad buttock, tender hide:
Look what a horse should have, he did not lack,
Save a proud rider on so proud a back.

Sometime he scuds far off and there he stares,
Anon he starts at stirring of a feather.
To bid the wind a base[7] he now prepares,
And where he run or fly they know not whether:
For through his mane and tail the high wind sings,
Fanning the hairs, who wave like feath'red wings.

He looks upon his love and neighs unto her,
She answers him as if she knew his mind,
Being proud, as females are, to see him woo her,
She puts on outward strangeness,[8] seems unkind,
Spurns at his love and scorns the heat he feels,
Beating his kind embracements with her heels.

Then like a melancholy malcontent,
He vails[9] his tail that like a falling plume
Cool shadow to his melting buttock lent.
He stamps, and bites the poor flies in his fume.
His love, perceiving how he was enraged,
Grew kinder, and his fury was assuaged.

His testy master goeth about to take him,
When lo the unbacked[10] breeder, full of fear,
Jealous of catching, swiftly doth forsake him,
With her the horse, and left Adonis there.
As they were mad unto the wood they hie them,
Outstripping crows that strive to overfly them.

All swoll'n with chafing,[11] down Adonis sits,
Banning[12] his boist'rous and unruly beast;
And now the happy season once more fits
That lovesick love, by pleading may be blessed:
For lovers say, the heart hath treble wrong,
When it is barred the aidance of the tongue.

An oven that is stopped, or river stayed,
Burneth more hotly, swelleth with more rage:
So of concealèd sorrow may be said,
Free vent of words love's fire doth assuage,
But when the heart's attorney[13] once is mute,
The client breaks, as desperate in his suit.

---

[1] told counted.
[2] curvets leaps.
[3] flattering encouraging; can also refer to "caressing"; Holla stop.
[4] caparisons ornamented coverings.
[5] Look when as when.
[6] limning out painting.
[7] bid the wind a base run a race with the wind; to "bid base" is to challenge someone to a race in the game of "prisoner's base."
[8] strangeness aloofness or coldness.
[9] vails lowers.
[10] unbacked untrained, unmounted.
[11] chafing anger, irritation.
[12] Banning cursing.
[13] heart's attorney one who speaks for the heart (i.e., the tongue).

He sees her coming and begins to glow,
Even as a dying coal revives with wind,
And with his bonnet[1] hides his angry brow,
Looks on the dull earth with disturbèd mind,
Taking no notice that she is so nigh,
For all askance he holds her in his eye.

Oh what a sight it was wistly[2] to view,
How she came stealing to the wayward boy,
To note the fighting conflict of her hue,
How white and red, each other did destroy:
But now her cheek was pale, and by and by
It flashed forth fire, as lightning from the sky.

Now was she just before him as he sat,
And like a lowly lover down she kneels,
With one fair hand she heaveth up his hat,
Her other tender hand his fair cheek feels:
His tend'rer cheek receives her soft hand's print,
As apt as new-fall'n snow takes any dint.[3]

Oh what a war of looks was then between them,
Her eyes petitioners to his eyes suing,
His eyes saw her eyes, as[4] they had not seen them,
Her eyes wooed still; his eyes disdained the wooing;
And all this dumb play had his[5] acts made plain,
With tears which, chorus-like, her eyes did rain.

Full gently now she takes him by the hand,
A lily prisoned in a gale of snow,
Or ivory in an alabaster band,
So white a friend engirds[6] so white a foe:
This beauteous combat, wilful and unwilling,
Showed like two silver doves that sit a-billing.

Once more the engine[7] of her thoughts began:
"O fairest mover on this mortal round,
Would thou wert as I am, and I a man,
My heart all whole as thine, thy heart my wound,
For one sweet look thy help I would assure thee,
Though nothing but my body's bane[8] would cure thee."

"Give me my hand," saith he. "Why dost thou feel it?"
"Give me my heart," saith she, "and thou shalt have it.
Oh give it me lest thy hard heart do steel it,[9]
And, being steeled, soft sighs can never grave[10] it.
Then love's deep groans I never shall regard,
Because Adonis' heart hath made mine hard."

"For shame," he cries, "let go, and let me go,
My day's delight is past, my horse is gone,
And 'tis your fault I am bereft him so,
I pray you hence, and leave me here alone,
For all my mind, my thought, my busy care,
Is how to get my palfrey from the mare."

Thus she replies: "Thy palfrey, as he should,
Welcomes the warm approach of sweet desire,
Affection is a coal that must be cooled,
Else suffered it will set the heart on fire,
The sea hath bounds, but deep desire hath none,
Therefore no marvel though thy horse be gone.

"How like a jade[11] he stood tied to the tree,
Servilely mastered with a leathern rein,
But when he saw his love, his youth's fair fee,
He held such petty bondage in disdain,
Throwing the base thong from his bending crest,
Enfranchising his mouth, his back, his breast.

---

[1] bonnet hat.
[2] wistly intently; also, with longing (i.e., wistfully).
[3] dint impression.
[4] as as if.
[5] his its; the dumb play's acts were explained (made plain) by the chorus-like tears.
[6] engirds encircles.
[7] engine instrument (i.e., her tongue).
[8] bane ruin.
[9] steel it harden it, with a play on steal.
[10] grave engrave.
[11] jade worn-out, inferior breed of horse.

"Who sees his true-love in her naked bed,
Teaching the sheets a whiter hue than white,
But when his glutton eye so full hath fed,
His other agents[1] aim at like delight?
Who is so faint that dares not be so bold,
To touch the fire, the weather being cold?

"Let me excuse thy courser, gentle boy,
And learn of him, I heartily beseech thee,
To take advantage on[2] presented joy.
Though I were dumb, yet his proceedings teach thee.
Oh learn to love, the lesson is but plain,
And once made perfect,[3] never lost again."

"I know not love," quoth he, "nor will not know it,
Unless it be a boar, and then I chase it.
'Tis much to borrow, and I will not owe it.
My love to love, is love but to disgrace it,
For I have heard, it is a life in death,
That laughs and weeps, and all but with a breath.[4]

"Who wears a garment shapeless and unfinished?
Who plucks the bud before one leaf put forth?
If springing things be any jot diminished,
They wither in their prime, prove nothing worth.
The colt that's backed and burthened being young,
Loseth his pride, and never waxeth strong.

"You hurt my hand with wringing, let us part
And leave this idle theme, this bootless[5] chat.
Remove your siege from my unyielding heart,
To love's alarms it will not ope the gate.
Dismiss your vows, your feigned tears, your flatt'ry,
For where a heart is hard, they make no batt'ry."

"What canst thou talk," quoth she. "Hast thou a tongue?
Oh would thou hadst not, or I had no hearing,
Thy mermaid's voice hath done me double wrong,
I had my load before, now pressed[6] with bearing.
Melodious discord, heavenly tune harsh sounding,
Ear's deep sweet music and heart's deep sore wounding.

"Had I no eyes but ears, my ears would love
That inward beauty and invisible,
Or were I deaf, thy outward parts would move
Each part in me, that were but sensible.
Though neither eyes, nor ears, to hear nor see,
Yet should I be in love, by touching thee.

"Say that the sense of feeling were bereft me,
And that I could not see, nor hear, nor touch,
And nothing but the very smell were left me,
Yet would my love to thee be still as much,
For from the stillitory[7] of thy face excelling,
Comes breath perfumed, that breedeth love by smelling.

"But oh what banquet wert thou to the taste,
Being nurse and feeder of the other four.
Would they not wish the feast might ever last
And bid suspicion double lock the door,
Lest jealousy, that sour unwelcome guest,
Should by his stealing in disturb the feast?"

Once more the ruby-coloured portal opened,
Which to his speech did honey passage yield,
Like a red morn that ever yet betokened
Wrack to the seaman, tempest to the field,
Sorrow to shepherds, woe unto the birds,
Gusts and foul flaws to herdsmen and to herds.

This ill presage advisedly she marketh,
Even as the wind is hushed before it raineth,
Or as the wolf doth grin before he barketh,

[1] agents senses.
[2] on of.
[3] made perfect learnt perfectly.
[4] but with a breath in the same breath, at the same time.
[5] bootless profitless.
[6] pressed oppressed or crushed; pressing was a form of torture.
[7] stillitory distillery.

Or as the berry breaks before it staineth,
Or like the deadly bullet of a gun,
His meaning struck her ere his words begun.

And at his look she flatly falleth down,
For looks kill love, and love by looks reviveth;
A smile recures[1] the wounding of a frown,
But blessèd bankrout[2] that by love so thriveth.
The silly[3] boy, believing she is dead,
Claps her pale cheek, till clapping makes it red.

And all amazed, brake off his late intent,
For sharply he did think to reprehend her,
Which cunning love did wittily prevent:
Fairfall[4] the wit that can so well defend her.
For on the grass she lies as she were slain,
Till his breath breatheth life in her again.

He wrings her nose, he strikes her on the cheeks,
He bends her fingers, holds her pulses hard,
He chafes her lips, a thousand ways he seeks,
To mend the hurt that his unkindness marred.[5]
He kisses her, and she by her good will,
Will never rise, so he will kiss her still.

The night of sorrow now is turned to day,
Her two blue windows faintly she upheaveth,
Like the fair sun when, in his fresh array,
He cheers the morn and all the earth relieveth:
And as the bright sun glorifies the sky,
So is her face illumined with her eye.

Whose beams upon his hairless face are fixed,
As if from thence they borrowed all their shine,
Were never four such lamps together mixed,
Had not his clouded with his brows repine.[6]
But hers, which through the crystal tears gave light,
Shone like the moon in water seen by night.

"Oh where am I," quoth she, "in earth or Heaven,
Or in the ocean drenched or in the fire?
What hour is this, or morn or weary even?[7]
Do I delight to die or life desire?
But now I lived, and life was death's annoy,
But now I died, and death was lively joy.

"Oh thou didst kill me, kill me once again.
Thy eyes' shrewd tutor, that hard heart of thine,
Hath taught them scornful tricks and such disdain,
That they have murd'red this poor heart of mine,
And these mine eyes, true leaders to their queen,
But for thy piteous lips no more had seen.

"Long may they kiss each other for this cure,
Oh never let their crimson liveries wear,[8]
And as they last, their verdure[9] still endure,
To drive infection from the dangerous year,
That the star-gazers, having writ on death,
May say the plague is banished by thy breath.

"Pure lips, sweet seals in my soft lips imprinted,
What bargains may I make still to be sealing?
To sell myself I can be well contented,
So thou wilt buy, and pay, and use good dealing,
Which purchase if thou make, for fear of slips,[10]
Set thy seal manual[11] on my wax-red lips.

"A thousand kisses buys my heart from me,
And pay them at thy leisure, one by one.
What is ten hundred touches unto thee?
Are they not quickly told, and quickly gone?
Say for non-payment that the debt should double,
Is twenty hundred kisses such a trouble?"

---

[1] recures cures.
[2] bankrout bankrupt.
[3] silly naive.
[4] Fairfall good fortune befall.
[5] marred made.
[6] repine discontent.
[7] even evening.
[8] liveries uniforms or clothing (i.e., the lips' red appearance); wear wear out.
[9] verdure freshness (especially in taste) and greenness; in the next line, the lips, like some plants, will ward off diseases.
[10] slips errors.
[11] seal manual a seal stamped on a document or letter for security or as proof of authority.

"Fair Queen," quoth he, "if any love you owe[1] me,
Measure my strangeness with my unripe years,
Before I know myself, seek not to know me;
No fisher but the ungrown fry forbears.[2]
The mellow plum doth fall, the green sticks fast,
Or being early plucked is sour to taste.

"Look, the world's comforter with weary gait,
His day's hot task hath ended in the west,
The owl (night's herald) shrieks, 'tis very late,
The sheep are gone to fold, birds to their nest,
And coal-black clouds, that shadow heaven's light,
Do summon us to part and bid goodnight.

"Now let me say goodnight, and so say you.
If you will say so, you shall have a kiss."
"Goodnight," quoth she, and ere he says adieu,
The honey fee of parting tendered[3] is.
Her arms do lend his neck a sweet embrace,
Incorporate[4] then they seem, face grows to face.

Till breathless he disjoined and backward drew
The heavenly moisture, that sweet coral mouth,
Whose precious taste, her thirsty lips well knew,
Whereon they surfeit, yet complain on drouth,[5]
He with her plenty pressed, she faint with dearth,
Their lips together glued, fall to the earth.

Now quick desire hath caught the yielding prey,
And glutton-like she feeds, yet never filleth,
Her lips are conquerors, his lips obey,
Paying what ransom the insulter willeth,
Whose vulture[6] thought doth pitch the price so high,
That she will draw his lips' rich treasure dry.

And having felt the sweetness of the spoil,
With blindfold fury she begins to forage,
Her face doth reek[7] and smoke, her blood doth boil,
And careless lust stirs up a desperate courage,
Planting oblivion,[8] beating reason back,
Forgetting shame's pure blush and honour's wrack.[9]

Hot, faint and weary with her hard embracing,
Like a wild bird being tamed with too much handling,
Or as the fleet-foot roe that's tired with chasing,
Or like the froward[10] infant stilled with dandling,
He now obeys, and now no more resisteth,
While she takes all she can, not all she listeth.[11]

What wax so frozen but dissolves with temp'ring,
And yields at last to every light impression?
Things out of hope are compassed oft with vent'ring,[12]
Chiefly in love, whose leave exceeds commission.[13]
Affection faints not like a pale-faced coward,
But then woos best, when most his choice is froward.

When he did frown, Oh, had she then gave over,
Such nectar from his lips she had not sucked.
Foul words and frowns must not repel a lover.
What though the rose have prickles, yet 'tis plucked.
Were beauty under twenty locks kept fast,
Yet love breaks through and picks them all at last.

For pity now she can no more detain him,
The poor fool prays her that he may depart,
She is resolved no longer to restrain him,

[1] owe bear.
[2] No fisher … forbears Fishers always throw back the small, young fish.
[3] tendered paid.
[4] Incorporate united in one body.
[5] drouth drought.
[6] vulture predatory, consuming.
[7] reek fume or smoke; can also mean "steam."
[8] Planting oblivion i.e., making her oblivious to anything else.
[9] wrack ruin.
[10] froward obstinate, ungovernable.
[11] listeth desires.
[12] are compassed …vent'ring i.e., are often got with trying.
[13] leave exceeds commission liberty exceeds command or instruction.

Bids him farewell, and look well to her heart,
The which by Cupid's bow she doth protest,
He carries thence encagèd in his breast.

"Sweet boy," she says, "this night I'll waste in sorrow,
For my sick heart commands mine eyes to watch.
Tell me, love's master, shall we meet tomorrow?
Say, shall we, shall we? Wilt thou make the match?"
He tells her no, tomorrow he intends
To hunt the boar with certain of his friends.

"The boar," quoth she, whereat a sudden pale,
Like lawn[1] being spread upon the blushing rose,
Usurps her cheek, she trembles at his tale,
And on his neck her yoking arms she throws.
She sinketh down, still hanging by his neck,
He on her belly falls, she on her back.

Now is she in the very lists[2] of love,
Her champion mounted for the hot encounter,
All is imaginary she doth prove,[3]
He will not manage[4] her, although he mount her,
That worse than Tantalus'[5] is her annoy,
To clip Elysium[6] and to lack her joy.

Even so poor birds, deceived with painted grapes,
Do surfeit by the eye and pine the maw:[7]
Even so she languisheth in her mishaps
As those poor birds that helpless berries[8] saw.
The warm effects which she in him finds missing,
She seeks to kindle with continual kissing.

But all in vain, good Queen; it will not be,
She hath assayed[9] as much as may be proved.
Her pleading hath deserved a greater fee:
She's love, she loves, and yet she is not loved.
"Fie, fie," he says, "you crush me. Let me go.
You have no reason to withhold me so."

"Thou hadst been gone," quoth she, "sweet boy ere this,
But that thou toldst me, thou wouldst hunt the boar.
Oh, be advised, thou knowst not what it is
With javelin's point a churlish swine to gore,
Whose tushes,[10] never sheathed, he whetteth still,
Like to a mortal[11] butcher bent to kill.

"On his bow-back he hath a battle set,
Of bristly pikes that ever threat his foes,
His eyes like glow-worms shine when he doth fret,
His snout digs sepulchres where'er he goes.
Being moved,[12] he strikes whate'er is in his way,
And whom he strikes, his crooked tushes slay.

"His brawny sides with hairy bristles armed
Are better proof[13] than thy spear's point can enter,
His short thick neck cannot be easily harmed;
Being ireful, on the lion he will venter.[14]
The thorny brambles and embracing bushes,
As fearful of him, part, through whom he rushes.

"Alas, he naught esteems that face of thine,
To which love's eyes pays tributary gazes,
Nor thy soft hands, sweet lips, and crystal eyne,[15]

---

1 lawn fine linen; laundry was often spread over hedges to dry.
2 lists enclosed space for tournaments.
3 All … prove i.e., she learns it is all in her imagination.
4 manage ride; put a horse through its paces.
5 Tantalus Punished in the underworld with eternal hunger and thirst, Tantalus stood in a pool of water which receded when he tried to drink from it, near a fruit tree whose branches were tossed aside by the wind every time he reached for the fruit.
6 clip Elysium clasp heaven.
7 pine the maw starve the stomach or appetite.
8 helpless berries berries that are of no help.
9 assayed tried.
10 tushes tusks.
11 mortal deadly.
12 moved moved to anger.
13 proof armour: proof armour is tested, strong.
14 ireful angry; venter venture or make an attack.
15 eyne eyes (archaic plural).

Whose full perfection all the world amazes,
But having thee at vantage (wondrous dread!)
Would root these beauties, as he roots the mead.[1]

"Oh, let him keep his loathsome cabin[2] still,
Beauty hath naught to do with such foul fiends,
Come not within his danger by thy will,
They that thrive well take counsel of their friends.
When thou didst name the boar, not to dissemble,
I feared thy fortune and my joints did tremble.

"Didst thou not mark my face? Was it not white?
Saw'st thou not signs of fear lurk in mine eye?
Grew I not faint and fell I not downright?
Within my bosom, whereon thou dost lie,
My boding heart pants, beats, and takes no rest,
But like an earthquake shakes thee on my breast.

"For where love reigns, disturbing jealousy
Doth call himself affection's sentinel,
Gives false alarms, suggesteth mutiny,
And in a peaceful hour doth cry 'kill, kill,'
Distemp'ring[3] gentle love in his desire,
As air and water do abate the fire.

"This sour informer, this bate-breeding[4] spy,
This canker[5] that eats up love's tender spring,
This carry-tale, dissentious jealousy,
That sometime true news, sometime false doth bring,
Knocks at my heart, and whispers in mine ear,
That if I love thee, I thy death should fear.

"And more than so, presenteth to mine eye
The picture of an angry chafing boar,
Under whose sharp fangs, on his back doth lie
An image like thyself, all stained with gore,
Whose blood upon the fresh flowers being shed,
Doth make them droop with grief, and hang the head.

"What should I do, seeing thee so indeed,
That tremble at th'imagination?
The thought of it doth make my faint heart bleed,
And fear doth teach it divination;
I prophesy thy death, my living sorrow,
If thou encounter with the boar tomorrow.

"But if thou needs wilt hunt, be ruled by me:
Uncouple[6] at the timorous flying hare,
Or at the fox which lives by subtlety,
Or at the roe[7] which no encounter dare.
Pursue these fearful creatures o'er the downs,
And on thy well-breathed horse keep with thy hounds.

"And when thou hast on foot the purblind[8] hare,
Mark the poor wretch, to over-shut[9] his troubles,
How he outruns the wind, and with what care,
He cranks and crosses[10] with a thousand doubles,
The many musits[11] through the which he goes,
Are like a labyrinth to amaze his foes.

"Sometime he runs among a flock of sheep
To make the cunning hounds mistake their smell,
And sometime where earth-delving conies[12] keep,
To stop the loud pursuers in their yell,
And sometime sorteth[13] with a herd of deer:
Danger deviseth shifts,[14] wit waits on fear.

[1] roots root up, dig up; mead meadow.
[2] keep keep to; cabin den.
[3] Distemp'ring diluting.
[4] bate-breeding causing debate or strife.
[5] canker cankerworm.
[6] Uncouple release the dogs.
[7] roe roebuck, the male of a species of small deer.
[8] purblind partially blind.
[9] to over-shut in order to run past.
[10] cranks and crosses twists and turns.
[11] musits little holes to hide in.
[12] conies rabbits.
[13] sorteth consorts.
[14] shifts tricks.

"For there his smell with others being mingled,
The hot scent-snuffing hounds are driven to doubt,
Ceasing their clamorous cry, till they have singled
With much ado the cold fault[1] cleanly out,
Then do they spend their mouths, echo replies,
As if another chase were in the skies.

"By this, poor Wat,[2] far off upon a hill,
Stands on his hinder-legs with list'ning ear,
To hearken if his foes pursue him still.
Anon their loud alarums[3] he doth hear,
And now his grief may be compared well
To one sore sick that hears the passing bell.[4]

"Then shalt thou see the dew-bedabbled wretch
Turn and return, indenting with the way,
Each envious briar his weary legs do scratch,
Each shadow makes him stop, each murmur stay,
For misery is trodden on by many,
And, being low, never relieved by any.

"Lie quietly, and hear a little more.
Nay, do not struggle, for thou shalt not rise.
To make thee hate the hunting of the boar,
Unlike myself thou hear'st me moralize,
Applying this to that, and so to so,
For love can comment upon every woe.

"Where did I leave?" "No matter where," quoth he.
"Leave me, and then the story aptly ends.
The night is spent." "Why, what of that?" quoth she.
"I am," quoth he, "expected of my friends,
And now 'tis dark, and going I shall fall."
"In night," quoth she, "desire sees best of all."

"But if thou fall, oh then imagine this:
The earth, in love with thee, thy footing trips,
And all is but to rob thee of a kiss.

Rich preys make true men thieves;[5] so do thy lips
Make modest Dian[6] cloudy and forlorn,
Lest she should steal a kiss and die forsworn.

"Now of this dark night I perceive the reason
Cynthia, for shame, obscures her silver shine
Till forging nature be condemned of treason
For stealing molds from Heaven that were divine,
Wherein she[7] framed thee, in high Heaven's despight,
To shame the sun by day and her[8] by night.

"And therefore hath she bribed the Destinies
To cross the curious workmanship of nature,
To mingle beauty with infirmities,
And pure perfection with impure defeature,[9]
Making it subject to the tyranny
Of mad mischances and much misery.

"As burning fevers, agues[10] pale and faint,
Life-poisoning pestilence and frenzies wood,[11]
The marrow-eating sickness whose attaint[12]
Disorder breeds by heating of the blood,
Surfeits, impostumes,[13] grief and damned despair,
Swear nature's death, for framing thee so fair.

"And not the least of all these maladies,
But in one minute's fight brings beauty under,
Both favour, savour, hue and qualities,
Whereat th'impartial gazer late did wonder,
Are on the sudden wasted, thawed and done,
As mountain snow melts with the midday sun.

---

1 cold fault lost scent.
2 Wat traditional name for a hare.
3 alarums warning sounds or a call to arms.
4 passing bell funeral bell.
5 Rich preys … thieves Riches can turn even honest men into thieves.
6 Dian Diana, the moon goddess, also known as Cynthia (line 728).
7 she nature.
8 her Cynthia.
9 defeature de-feature or disfigurement; defeat-ure or undoing.
10 agues shaking, cold sweats in a fever.
11 wood mad.
12 attaint infection.
13 impostumes abscesses, festering sores.

"Therefore despite of fruitless[1] chastity,
Love-lacking vestals[2] and self-loving nuns,
That on the earth would breed a scarcity
And barren dearth of daughters and of sons,
Be prodigal: the lamp that burns by night
Dries up his oil to lend the world his light.

"What is thy body but a swallowing grave,
Seeming to bury that posterity
Which by the rights of time thou needs must have,
If thou destroy them not in dark obscurity?
If so the world will hold thee in disdain,
Sith[3] in thy pride so fair a hope is slain.

"So in thyself, thyself art made away,
A mischief worse than civil home-bred strife,
Or theirs whose desperate hands themselves do slay,
Or butcher sire that reaves[4] his son of life.
Foul cank'ring rust, the hidden treasure frets,[5]
But gold that's put to use more gold begets."

"Nay then," quoth Adon, "you will fall again
Into your idle over-handled theme.
The kiss I gave you is bestowed in vain,
And all in vain you strive against the stream,
For by this black-faced night, desire's foul nurse,
Your treatise makes me like you worse and worse.

"If love have lent you twenty thousand tongues,
And every tongue more moving than your own,
Bewitching like the wanton mermaid's songs,
Yet from mine ear the tempting tune is blown,
For know my heart stands armèd in mine ear,
And will not let a false sound enter there.

"Lest the deceiving harmony should run
Into the quiet closure[6] of my breast,
And then my little heart were quite undone,
In his bed-chamber to be barred of rest.
No, lady, no. My heart longs not to groan,
But soundly sleeps, while now it sleeps alone.

"What have you urg'd that I cannot reprove?[7]
The path is smooth that leadeth on to danger.
I hate not love, but your device[8] in love,
That lends embracements unto every stranger.
You do it for increase, Oh strange excuse!
When reason is the bawd to lust's abuse.

"Call it not love, for love to Heaven is fled,
Since sweating lust on earth usurped his name,
Under whose[9] simple semblance he hath fed
Upon fresh beauty, blotting it with blame;
Which the hot tyrant stains and soon bereaves,
As caterpillars do the tender leaves.

"Love comforteth like sunshine after rain,
But lust's effect is tempest after sun.
Love's gentle spring doth always fresh remain,
Lust's winter comes, ere summer half be done.
Love surfeits not, lust like a glutton dies;
Love is all truth, lust full of forgèd lies.

"More I could tell, but more I dare not say,
The text is old, the orator too green.
Therefore in sadness, now I will away,
My face is full of shame, my heart of teen,[10]
Mine ears that to your wanton talk attended,
Do burn themselves for having so offended."

With this he breaketh from the sweet embrace
Of those fair arms which bound him to her breast,

[1] despite of fruitless in spite of barren.
[2] vestals pure, chaste virgins.
[3] Sith since.
[4] butcher sire that reaves murdering father who robs.
[5] frets erodes.
[6] closure enclosure.
[7] reprove reject, censure.
[8] device discourse, contrivance.
[9] whose love's.
[10] teen vexation, grief.

And homeward through the dark laund[1] runs apace,
Leaves love upon her back, deeply distressed.
Look how a bright star shooteth from the sky,
So glides he in the night from Venus' eye.

Which after him she darts, as one on shore
Gazing upon a late embarked friend,
Till the wild waves will have him seen no more,
Whose ridges with the meeting clouds contend.
So did the merciless and pitchy[2] night,
Fold in the object that did feed her sight.

Whereat amazed as one that unaware
Hath dropped a precious jewel in the flood,
Or 'stonished,[3] as night wand'rers often are,
Their light blown out in some mistrustful wood,
Even so confounded in the dark she lay,
Having lost the fair discovery of her way.

And now she beats her heart, whereat it groans,
That all the neighbour caves, as seeming troubled,
Make verbal repetition of her moans,
Passion on passion deeply is redoubled.
"Ay me," she cries, and twenty times "Woe, woe,"
And twenty echoes twenty times cry so.

She marking them, begins a wailing note,
And sings extemporally a woeful ditty,
How love makes young men thrall and old men dote,
How love is wise in folly, foolish witty.
Her heavy anthem still concludes in woe,
And still the choir of echoes answer so.

Her song was tedious[4] and outwore the night,
For lovers' hours are long, though seeming short.
If pleased themselves, others they think delight
In such-like circumstance, with such-like sport.
Their copious stories oftentimes begun,
End without audience and are never done.

For who hath she to spend the night withal[5]
But idle sounds resembling parasits?[6]
Like shrill-tongued tapsters[7] answering every call,
Soothing the humour of fantastic wits.
She says, "'Tis so," they answer all "'Tis so,"
And would say after her, if she said no.

Lo here the gentle lark, weary of rest,
From his moist cabinet[8] mounts up on high,
And wakes the morning, from whose silver breast
The sun ariseth in his majesty,
Who doth the world so gloriously behold,
That cedar tops and hills seem burnished gold.

Venus salutes him with this fair good morrow:
"O thou clear god, and patron of all light,
From whom each lamp and shining star doth borrow
The beauteous influence that makes him bright,
There lives a son that sucked an earthly mother
May lend thee light, as thou dost lend to other."

This said, she hasteth to a myrtle grove,
Musing the morning is so much o're-worn,
And yet she hears no tidings of her love.
She harkens for his hounds and for his horn,
Anon she hears them chant it lustily,
And all in haste she coasteth to the cry.

And as she runs, the bushes in the way,
Some catch her by the neck, some kiss her face,
Some twine about her thigh to make her stay.

---

[1] laund lawn or glade.
[2] pitchy black, but also turbulent (continuing the wave imagery of the earlier lines).
[3] 'stonished astonished.
[4] tedious long.
[5] withal with.
[6] parasits parasites, the echoes living on her voice.
[7] tapsters those who draw beer; the innkeepers.
[8] cabinet nest.

She wildly breaketh from their strict embrace,
Like a milch doe, whose swelling dugs[1] do ache,
Hasting to feed her fawn hid in some brake.

By this she hears the hounds are at a bay,[2]
Whereat she starts like one that spies an adder
Wreathed up in fatal folds just in his way,
The fear whereof doth make him shake and shudder;
Even so the timorous yelping of the hounds
Appals her senses and her spirit confounds.

For now she knows it is no gentle chase,
But the blunt boar, rough bear, or lion proud,
Because the cry remaineth in one place,
Where fearfully the dogs exclaim aloud,
Finding their enemy to be so cursed,
They all strain court'sy who shall cope him first.[3]

This dismal cry rings sadly in her ear,
Through which it enters to surprise her heart,
Who overcome by doubt and bloodless fear,
With cold-pale weakness numbs each feeling part;
Like soldiers when their captain once doth yield,
They basely fly and dare not stay the field.

Thus stands she in a trembling ecstasy,[4]
Till cheering up her senses all dismayed,
She tells them 'tis a causeless fantasy
And childish error that they are afraid,
Bids them leave quaking, bids them fear no more,
And with that word, she spied the hunted boar.

Whose frothy mouth bepainted all with red,
Like milk and blood being mingled both together,
A second fear through all her sinews spread,
Which madly hurries her, she knows not whither.
This way she runs, and now she will no further,
But back retires to rate the boar for murther.[5]

A thousand spleens[6] bear her a thousand ways,
She treads the path that she untreads again.
Her more than haste is mated[7] with delays,
Like the proceedings of a drunken brain,
Full of respects, yet naught at all respecting,
In hand with all things, naught at all effecting.

Here kennelled in a brake she finds a hound,
And asks the weary caitiff[8] for his master,
And there another licking of his wound,
'Gainst venomed sores the only sovereign plaster.
And here she meets another, sadly scowling,
To whom she speaks, and he replies with howling.

When he hath ceased his ill-resounding noise,
Another flap-mouthed mourner, black and grim,
Against the welkin[9] volleys out his voice,
Another and another answer him,
Clapping their proud tails to the ground below,
Shaking their scratched ears, bleeding as they go.

Look how the world's poor people are amazed
At apparitions, signs and prodigies,
Whereon with fearful eyes they long have gazed,
Infusing them with dreadful prophecies;
So she at these sad signs draws up her breath,
And sighing it again, exclaims on death.

---

[1] milch milk; dugs udders.

[2] at a bay barking in their final encounter with the prey; facing the prey, as it turns towards the attackers.

[3] strain … first politely defer to one another (i.e., none of the dogs are eager to attack the vicious boar).

[4] ecstasy the state of being "beside oneself"; in a stupor or frenzy.

[5] rate berate; murther murder.

[6] spleens impulses.

[7] mated confounded, checked by.

[8] caitiff wretch.

[9] welkin sky, heavens.

"Hard-favoured tyrant, ugly, meagre, lean,
Hateful divorce[1] of love" (thus chides she death),
"Grim-grinning ghost, earth's worm, what dost thou mean
To stifle beauty, and to steal his breath?
Who, when he lived, his breath and beauty set
Gloss on the rose, smell to the violet.

"If he be dead, Oh no, it cannot be,
Seeing his beauty, thou shouldst strike at it.
Oh yes, it may, thou hast no eyes to see,
But hatefully at random dost thou hit.
Thy mark[2] is feeble age, but thy false dart
Mistakes that aim and cleaves an infant's heart.

"Hadst thou but bid beware, then he had spoke,
And hearing him, thy power had lost his[3] power.
The Destinies will curse thee for this stroke:
They bid thee crop a weed; thou pluckst a flower.
Love's golden arrow at him should have fled,
And not death's ebon[4] dart to strike him dead.

"Dost thou drink tears, that thou provokst such weeping?
What may a heavy groan advantage thee?
Why hast thou cast into eternal sleeping
Those eyes that taught all other eyes to see?
Now nature cares not for thy mortal[5] vigour,
Since her best work is ruined with thy rigour."

Here overcome as one full of despair,
She veiled her eyelids, who like sluices[6] stopped
The crystal tide that from her two cheeks fair
In the sweet channel of her bosom dropped.
But through the floodgates breaks the silver rain,
And with his strong course opens them again.

Oh how her eyes and tears did lend and borrow,
Her eye seen in the tears, tears in her eye,
Both crystals, where they viewed each other's sorrow:
Sorrow that friendly sighs sought still to dry,
But, like a stormy day, now wind, now rain,
Sighs dry her cheeks, tears make them wet again.

Variable passions throng her constant woe,
As striving who should best become her grief.
All entertained, each passion labours so
That every present sorrow seemeth chief,
But none is best, then join they all together,
Like many clouds, consulting for foul weather.

By this far off, she hears some huntsman hallo,[7]
A nurse's song ne'er pleased her babe so well,
The dire imagination she did follow,
This sound of hope doth labour to expel,
For now reviving joy bids her rejoice,
And flatters her it is Adonis' voice.

Whereat her tears began to turn their tide,
Being prisoned in her eye, like pearls in glass,
Yet sometimes falls an orient[8] drop beside,
Which her cheek melts, as scorning it should pass
To wash the foul face of the sluttish ground,
Who is but drunken when she seemeth drowned.

O hard-believing love, how strange it seems!
Not to believe and yet too credulous:
Thy weal and woe are both of them extremes,
Despair, and hope, makes thee ridiculous.
The one doth flatter thee in thoughts unlikely,
In likely thoughts the other kills thee quickly.

Now she unweaves the web that she hath wrought,
Adonis lives, and death is not to blame.
It was not she that called him all to naught;[9]

[1] divorce divorcer, divider.
[2] mark target.
[3] his its.
[4] ebon ebony, black; perhaps also referring to the hard, black wood.
[5] mortal deadly.
[6] veiled lowered; sluices sluice gates, used to stop the flow of water.
[7] hallo a shout to urge on the dogs.
[8] orient shining.
[9] all to naught worthless.

Now she adds honours to his hateful name.
She clepes[1] him king of graves, and grave for kings,
Imperious supreme of all mortal things.

"No, no," quoth she, "sweet death, I did but jest.
Yet pardon me, I felt a kind of fear
When as I met the boar, that bloody beast,
Which knows no pity but is still severe,
Then gentle shadow (truth I must confess)
I railed on thee, fearing my love's decess.[2]

"'Tis not my fault; the boar provoked my tongue,
Be wreaked[3] on him (invisible commander).
'Tis he, foul creature, that hath done thee wrong,
I did but act;[4] he's author of thy slander.
Grief hath two tongues, and never woman yet
Could rule them both, without ten women's wit."

Thus hoping that Adonis is alive,
Her rash suspect[5] she doth extenuate,
And that his beauty may the better thrive,
With death she humbly doth insinuate,[6]
Tells him of trophies, statues, tombs and stories,
His victories, his triumphs and his glories.

"O Jove," quoth she, "how much a fool was I,
To be of such a weak and silly mind,
To wail his death who lives, and must not die,
Till mutual overthrow of mortal kind?
For he being dead, with him is beauty slain,
And beauty dead, black chaos comes again.

"Fie, fie, fond love, thou art as full of fear
As one with treasure laden, hemmed with thieves.
Trifles unwitnessèd with eye or ear
Thy coward heart with false bethinking grieves."
Even at this word she hears a merry horn,
Whereat she leaps, that was but late forlorn.

As falcons to the lure,[7] away she flies,
The grass stoops not, she treads on it so light,
And in her haste unfortunately spies
The foul boar's conquest on her fair delight,
Which seen, her eyes are murd'red with the view,
Like stars ashamed of[8] day, themselves withdrew.

Or as the snail, whose tender horns being hit,
Shrinks backward in his shelly cave with pain,
And there all smothered up, in shade doth sit,
Long after fearing to creep forth again:
So at his bloody view her eyes are fled
Into the deep-dark cabins of her head,

Where they resign their office and their light
To the disposing of her troubled brain,
Who bids them still consort with ugly night,
And never wound the heart with looks again,
Who, like a king perplexèd in his throne,
By their suggestion gives a deadly groan,

Whereat each tributary subject[9] quakes,
As when the wind imprisoned in the ground,
Struggling for passage, earth's foundation shakes,[10]
Which with cold terror doth men's minds confound.
This mutiny each part doth so surprise
That from their dark beds once more leap her eyes.

And being opened, threw unwilling light
Upon the wide wound that the boar had trenched
In his soft flank, whose wonted lily white,

[1] clepes proclaims.
[2] decess decease.
[3] wreaked revenged.
[4] act react.
[5] suspect suspicion.
[6] insinuate ingratiate herself.
[7] lure bait used in training falcons.
[8] ashamed of shamed by the brightness of.
[9] tributary subject each subject or subordinate who pays tribute to the king; each member (of her body); (in the following line) each contributing blast of wind.
[10] As when … shakes an earthquake.

With purple tears that his wound wept, had drenched.
No flower was nigh, no grass, herb, leaf or weed,
But stole his blood, and seemed with him to bleed.

This solemn sympathy poor Venus noteth,
Over one shoulder doth she hang her head,
Dumbly she passions,[1] frantically she doteth,
She thinks he could not die, he is not dead.
Her voice is stopped, her joints forget to bow,
Her eyes are mad that they have wept till now.[2]

Upon his hurt she looks so steadfastly
That her sight dazzling, makes the wound seem three,
And then she reprehends her mangling eye
That makes more gashes where no breach should be.
His face seems twain, each several limb is doubled,
For oft the eye mistakes, the brain being troubled.

"My tongue cannot express my grief for one,
And yet," quoth she, "behold two Adons dead.
My sighs are blown away, my salt tears gone,
Mine eyes are turned to fire, my heart to lead,
Heavy heart's lead melt at mine eyes' red fire,
So shall I die by drops of hot desire.

"Alas, poor world, what treasure hast thou lost?
What face remains alive that's worth the viewing?
Whose tongue is music now? What canst thou boast
Of things long since, or anything ensuing?
The flowers are sweet, their colours fresh and trim,
But true sweet beauty lived and died with him.

"Bonnet nor veil henceforth no creature wear,
Nor sun, nor wind will ever strive to kiss you,
Having no[3] fair to lose, you need not fear,
The sun doth scorn you and the wind doth hiss you.
But when Adonis lived, sun and sharp air
Lurked like two thieves to rob him of his fair.

"And therefore would he put his bonnet on,
Under whose brim the gaudy sun would peep,
The wind would blow it off and, being gone,
Play with his locks, then would Adonis weep,
And straight in pity of his tender years,
They both would strive who first should dry his tears.

"To see his face the lion walked along
Behind some hedge, because he would not fear[4] him.
To recreate himself when he hath song,
The tiger would be tame and gently hear him.
If he had spoke, the wolf would leave his prey,
And never fright the silly lamb that day.

"When he beheld his shadow in the brook,
The fishes spread on it their golden gills.
When he was by, the birds such pleasure took
That some would sing, some other in their bills
Would bring him mulberries and ripe-red cherries;
He fed them with his sight, they him with berries.

"But this foul, grim and urchin-snouted[5] boar,
Whose downward eye still looketh for a grave,
Ne'er saw the beauteous livery[6] that he wore,
Witness the entertainment that he gave.
If he did see his face, why then I know
He thought to kiss him, and hath killed him so.

[1] passions suffers.
[2] till now before now.
[3] no nothing.
[4] fear frighten.
[5] urchin-snouted deformed or mischievously nosed (with tusks).
[6] livery form.

"'Tis true, 'tis true, thus was Adonis slain.
He ran upon the boar with his sharp spear,
Who did not whet his teeth at him again,
But by a kiss thought to persuade him[1] there,
And nousling[2] in his flank, the loving swine
Sheathed unaware the tusk in his soft groin.

"Had I been toothed like him I must confess,
With kissing him I should have killed him first,
But he is dead, and never did he bless
My youth with his, the more am I accursed."
With this she falleth in the place she stood,
And stains her face with his congealèd blood.

She looks upon his lips and they are pale,
She takes him by the hand, and that is cold,
She whispers in his ears a heavy tale,
As if they heard the woeful words she told.
She lifts the coffer-lids[3] that close his eyes,
Where lo, two lamps burnt out in darkness lies.

Two glasses where herself herself beheld
A thousand times, and now no more reflect,
Their virtue[4] lost, wherein they late excelled,
And every beauty robbed of his effect.
"Wonder of time," quoth she, "this is my spite,
That thou being dead, the day should yet be light.

"Since thou art dead, lo here I prophesy
Sorrow on love hereafter shall attend;
It shall be waited on with jealousy,
Find sweet beginning, but unsavoury end;
Ne'er settled equally, but high or low,
That all love's pleasure shall not match his woe.

"It shall be fickle, false and full of fraud,
Bud and be blasted, in a breathing while,[5]
The bottom poison, and the top o're-straw'd[6]
With sweets that shall the truest sight beguile,
The strongest body shall it make most weak,
Strike the wise dumb, and teach the fool to speak.

"It shall be sparing and too full of riot,
Teaching decrepit age to tread the measures,[7]
The staring[8] ruffian shall it keep in quiet,
Pluck down the rich, enrich the poor with treasures,
It shall be raging mad and silly mild,
Make the young old, the old become a child.

"It shall suspect where is no cause of fear,
It shall not fear where it should most mistrust,
It shall be merciful and too severe,
And most deceiving, when it seems most just,
Perverse it shall be where it shows most toward,[9]
Put fear to valour, courage to the coward.

"It shall be cause of war and dire events,
And set dissension 'twixt the son and sire,
Subject and servile to all discontents,
As dry combustious matter is to fire,
Sith in his prime, death doth my love destroy,
They that love best, their loves shall not enjoy."

By this the boy that by her side lay killed
Was melted like a vapour from her sight,
And in his blood that on the ground lay spilled,
A purple flower sprung up, check'red[10] with white,
Resembling well his pale cheeks, and the blood
Which in round drops upon their whiteness stood.

She bows her head the new-sprung flower to smell,
Comparing it to her Adonis' breath,
And says within her bosom it shall dwell,

---

[1] persuade him persuade him of his love.
[2] nousling nuzzling.
[3] coffer-lids eye lids; a coffer is a container, often for treasure; it can also refer to a coffin.
[4] virtue power.
[5] in a breathing while in a breath.
[6] o're-straw'd over-strewn.
[7] tread the measures dance.
[8] staring glaring.
[9] toward obliging, hopeful.
[10] check'red checkered.

Since he himself is reft[1] from her by death.
She crops the stalk, and in the breach appears
Green-dropping sap, which she compares to tears.

"Poor flower," quoth she, "this was thy father's guise,[2]
Sweet issue of a more sweet-smelling sire,
For every little grief to wet his eyes,
To grow unto himself was his desire,
And so 'tis thine, but know it is as good
To wither in my breast as in his blood.

"Here was thy father's bed, here in my breast.
Thou art the next of blood, and 'tis thy right.
Lo in this hollow cradle take thy rest,
My throbbing heart shall rock thee day and night.
There shall not be one minute in an hour
Wherein I will not kiss my sweet love's flower."

Thus, weary of the world, away she hies,
And yokes her silver doves, by whose swift aid,
Their mistress mounted through the empty skies,
In her light chariot quickly is conveyed,
Holding their course to Paphos,[3] where their Queen,
Means to immure herself and not be seen.

—1593

[1] reft torn.
[2] guise manner, shape.
[3] Paphos Venus' home in Cyprus.

from Sonnets

To the only begetter of these ensuing Sonnets
Mr. W.H. all happiness and that eternity promised by our ever-living poet wisheth the well-wishing adventurer in setting forth.
T.T.[4]

2

When forty winters shall besiege thy brow,
And dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field,
Thy youth's proud livery[5] so gazed on now,
Will be a tottered weed[6] of small worth held:
Then being asked where all thy beauty lies,
Where all the treasure of thy lusty days,
To say within thine own deep-sunken eyes
Were[7] an all-eating shame and thriftless praise.
How much more praise deserved thy beauty's use,[8]
If thou couldst answer, "This fair child of mine
Shall sum my count, and make my old excuse,"
Proving his beauty by succession thine.
This were to be new made when thou art old,
And see thy blood warm when thou feel'st it cold.

3

Look in thy glass[9] and tell the face thou viewest,
Now is the time that face should form another,
Whose fresh repair[10] if now thou not renewest,
Thou dost beguile the world, unbless some mother.[11]

[4] W.H. may be a misprint for W. Sh., or may be the initials of the young man who inspired the first 126 sonnets (perhaps Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southhampton or William Herbert, earl of Pembroke). T.T. is the printer, Thomas Thorpe. Generally accepted emendations to the 1609 edition have been incorporated into the texts below, but the original 1609 readings are included in the footnotes.
[5] livery uniform or appearance.
[6] tottered tattered or shaken, ready to fall; weed clothing or plant.
[7] Were would be.
[8] deserved thy beauty's use i.e., would the use of thy beauty deserve.
[9] glass mirror.
[10] repair condition; also idea of interaction with others.
[11] beguile cheat; unbless some mother i.e., not allow a woman the blessing of being a mother.

For where is she so fair whose uneared[1] womb
Disdains the tillage of thy husbandry?[2]
Or who is he so fond[3] will be the tomb
Of his self-love to stop posterity?
Thou art thy mother's glass and she in thee
Calls back the lovely April of her prime,
So thou through windows of thine age shalt see,
Despite of wrinkles, this thy golden time.
But if thou live rememb'red not to be,
Die single and thine image dies with thee.

4

Unthrifty loveliness, why dost thou spend
Upon thyself thy beauty's legacy?
Nature's bequest gives nothing but doth lend,
And being frank she lends to those are free:[4]
Then, beauteous niggard, why dost thou abuse
The bounteous largess given thee to give?
Profitless usurer, why dost thou use[5]
So great a sum of sums yet canst not live?
For having traffic[6] with thyself alone,
Thou of thyself thy sweet self dost deceive,
Then how when nature calls thee to be gone,
What acceptable audit canst thou leave?
Thy unused beauty must be tombed with thee,
Which usèd lives th'executor to be.

12

When I do count the clock that tells the time,
And see the brave[7] day sunk in hideous night,
When I behold the violet past prime,
And sable curls or[8] silvered o'er with white,
When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
Which erst[9] from heat did canopy the herd,
And summer's green all girded up in sheaves
Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard:[10]
Then of thy beauty do I question make
That thou among the wastes of time must go,
Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake,
And die as fast as they see others grow,
And nothing 'gainst Time's scythe can make defence
Save breed to brave[11] him when he takes thee hence.

17

Who will believe my verse in time to come
If it were filled with your most high deserts?
Though yet Heaven knows it is but as a tomb
Which hides your life, and shows not half your parts.
If I could write the beauty of your eyes,
And in fresh numbers[12] number all your graces,
The age to come would say, "This poet lies,
Such heavenly touches ne'er touched earthly faces."
So should my papers (yellowed with their age)
Be scorned, like old men of less truth than tongue,
And your true rights be termed a poet's rage,[13]
And stretchèd metre of an antique song.
But were some child of yours alive that time,
You should live twice, in it and in my rhyme.

18

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date:
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimmed,
And every fair from fair sometime declines,
By chance, or nature's changing course untrimmed:[14]
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,

---

[1] uneared unploughed or untilled.

[2] husbandry referring to both the care of a husband and to agriculture.

[3] fond foolish.

[4] frank and free are synonyms meaning "generous."

[5] use This term is connected to the economic image throughout; usury is to lend for profit.

[6] traffic dealings (sexual).

[7] brave grand, glorious.

[8] sable black; or Many editors change this to "all."

[9] erst once.

[10] bier harvest cart, funeral bier; beard refers to the ripened grain and to a man's beard.

[11] breed have children; brave defy.

[12] numbers verses.

[13] rage poetic fury or imagination.

[14] untrimmed deprived of elegance and ornament.

Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st,[1]
Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade,
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st.[2]
So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

20

A woman's face with nature's own hand painted[3]
Hast thou, the master mistress of my passion,
A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
With shifting change as is false women's fashion;
An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling,[4]
Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth;
A man in hue, all hues in his controlling,[5]
Which steals men's eyes and women's souls amazeth.
And for[6] a woman wert thou first created,
Till nature as she wrought thee fell a-doting,
And by addition me of thee defeated,
By adding one thing to my purpose nothing.[7]
But since she pricked thee out for women's pleasure,
Mine be thy love, and thy love's use their treasure.[8]

23

As an unperfect actor on the stage,
Who with his fear is put besides[9] his part,
Or some fierce thing replete with too much rage,
Whose strength's abundance weakens his own heart,
So I, for fear of trust, forget to say
The perfect ceremony of love's right,[10]
And in mine own love's strength seem to decay,
O'ercharged with burden of mine own love's might.
Oh let my books[11] be then the eloquence
And dumb presagers[12] of my speaking breast,
Who plead for love, and look for recompense,
More than that tongue[13] that more hath more expressed.
Oh learn to read what silent love hath writ;
To hear with eyes belongs to love's fine wit.[14]

29

When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes,
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heaven with my bootless[15] cries,
And look upon myself and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one[16] more rich in hope,
Featured like him, like him with friends possessed,
Desiring this man's art, and that man's scope,[17]
With what I most enjoy contented least,
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply[18] I think on thee, and then my state
(Like to the lark at break of day arising)[19]
From sullen earth sings hymns at heaven's gate,
For thy sweet love rememb'red such wealth brings,
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

---

[1] ow'st own.

[2] in eternal lines … grow'st i.e., in eternal poetry you are grafted onto eternity.

[3] with nature's own hand painted i.e., without cosmetics.

[4] rolling wandering.

[5] A man … controlling a man in looks, and one whose looks control others, or include other appearances.

[6] for to be.

[7] And by addition … nothing defeated me by adding "one thing" (a penis), which is of no use to me. However, "nothing" was also a common slang term for the female genitalia.

[8] Mine be … treasure i.e., I'll have your love, and women can have the "use," both the physical use, and the interest from love's principal.

[9] put besides forgets.

[10] love's right love's desert, as well as "love's rite" or "ritual."

[11] books these verses.

[12] presagers those who give warning; those who predict or portend.

[13] that tongue the tongue of a rival.

[14] wit "wiht" in the 1609 edition.

[15] bootless fruitless, useless.

[16] like to one The speaker here begins to compare himself to other men.

[17] art skill, ability; scope range.

[18] Haply by chance, with a play on "happily."

[19] The parentheses end here in the 1609 edition; the final parenthesis is often moved after "earth" in the next line.

30

When to the sessions of sweet silent thought
I summon up remembrance of things past,
I sigh[1] the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste,[2]
Then can I drown an eye (unused to flow)
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan th'expense[3] of many a vanished sight,
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,
And heavily from woe to woe tell o'er
The sad account[4] of fore-bemoanèd moan,
Which I new pay as if not paid before.
But if the while I think on thee (dear friend)
All losses are restored, and sorrows end.

32

If thou survive my well-contented day,[5]
When that churl death my bones with dust shall cover,
And shalt by fortune once more re-survey
These poor rude[6] lines of thy deceasèd lover,
Compare them with the bett'ring[7] of the time,
And though they be outstripped by every pen,
Reserve[8] them for my love, not for their rhyme,
Exceeded by the height of happier men.
O then vouchsafe me but this loving thought:
Had my friend's muse grown with this growing age,
A dearer birth[9] than this his love had brought
To march in ranks of better equipage;[10]
But since he died and poets better prove,
Theirs for their style I'll read, his for his love.

[1] sigh sigh at.
[2] dear time's waste the waste of precious time or life.
[3] th'expense the spending or passing.
[4] account story, total (continuing the economic imagery).
[5] my well-contented day the day of my death (which I will be content to face).
[6] rude unrefined.
[7] bett'ring improved verse.
[8] Reserve keep.
[9] birth creation (poem).
[10] equipage equipment, carriage: a better style of verse.

40[11]

Take all my loves, my love, yea take them all,
What hast thou then more than thou hadst before?
No love, my love, that thou mayst true love call,
All mine was thine, before thou hadst this more.
Then if for my love, thou my love receivest,[12]
I cannot blame thee, for my love thou usest,[13]
But yet be blamed, if thou this self[14] deceivest
By wilful taste of what thyself refusest.
I do forgive thy robb'ry, gentle thief,
Although thou steal thee all my poverty;[15]
And yet love knows it is a greater grief
To bear love's wrong than hate's known injury.
Lascivious grace, in whom all ill well shows,
Kill me with spites, yet we must not be foes.

42

That thou hast her, it is not all my grief,
And yet it may be said I loved her dearly;
That she hath thee is of my wailing chief,
A loss in love that touches me more nearly.
Loving offenders, thus I will excuse ye:
Thou dost love her because thou know'st I love her,
And for my sake even so doth she abuse[16] me,
Suff'ring my friend for my sake to approve[17] her.
If I lose thee, my loss is my love's[18] gain,
And losing[19] her, my friend hath found that loss.
Both find each other, and I lose both twain,
And both for my sake lay on me this cross.[20]

[11] Sonnets 40-42 introduce a love triangle: the speaker's female beloved (who may or may not be the woman of the later sonnets) is also loved by the young man.
[12] Then if for my love … receivest i.e., if for love of me you welcome my beloved.
[13] for my love thou usest i.e., because you use (sexually) my beloved; because you debase my beloved, or my love for you.
[14] this self myself (or the woman, or the young man).
[15] poverty the little I have.
[16] abuse misuse.
[17] approve test (sexually).
[18] my love's my mistress's.
[19] losing my loss of.
[20] cross affliction.

But here's the joy, my friend and I are one,
Sweet flattery, then she loves but me alone.

44

If the dull[1] substance of my flesh were thought,
Injurious distance should not stop my way,
For then despite of space I would be brought,
From limits far remote, where[2] thou dost stay.
No matter then although my foot did stand
Upon the farthest earth removed from thee,
For nimble thought can jump both sea and land
As soon as think the place where he would be.
But ah, thought kills me that I am not thought
To leap large lengths of miles when thou art gone,
But that, so much of earth and water wrought,[3]
I must attend time's leisure with my moan.
Receiving naught by elements so slow,
But heavy tears, badges[4] of either's woe.

45

The other two,[5] slight air and purging fire,
Are both with thee, wherever I abide,
The first my thought, the other my desire,
These present absent with swift motion slide.
For when these quicker elements are gone
In tender embassy of love to thee,
My life being made of four, with two alone
Sinks down to death, oppressed with melancholy,
Until life's composition be recured[6]
By those swift messengers returned from thee,
Who even but now come back again, assured
Of thy fair health, recounting it to me.
This told, I joy, but then no longer glad,
I send them back again and straight grow sad.

55

Not marble nor the gilded monuments
Of princes shall outlive this pow'rful rhyme,
But you shall shine more bright in these contents
Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish[7] time.
When wasteful war shall statues overturn,
And broils root out the work of masonry,
Nor Mars his sword,[8] nor war's quick fire shall burn
The living record of your memory.
'Gainst death and all oblivious enmity
Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room,
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.[9]
So till the judgment that yourself arise,
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

71

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear the surly sullen bell
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world with vildest[10] worms to dwell;
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it, for I love you so,
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.
Oh if (I say) you look upon this verse,
When I (perhaps) compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,
But let your love even with my life decay.
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,
And mock you with me after I am gone.

73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold
When yellow leaves, or none, or few do hang Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,

---

1 dull heavy.
2 where to where.
3 But that … wrought This alludes to two of the four elements thought to compose all matter: earth and water were considered heavy (and slow); air and fire, which appear in sonnet 45, were considered lighter (and faster).
4 badges signs.
5 The other two See p. 1083, note 3.
6 recured cured, recovered.
7 sluttish slovenly.
8 Mars his sword Mars' sword, the older form of the possessive.
9 ending doom Doomsday or Judgment Day, when bodies are said to arise from the dead to be reunited with their souls.
10 vildest vilest.

Bare ruined choirs,[1] where late the sweet birds sang.
In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self that seals up all in rest.
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the death-bed whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by.
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well, which thou must leave ere long.

76

Why is my verse so barren of new pride?
So far from variation or quick change?
Why with the time[2] do I not glance aside
To new-found methods, and to compounds strange?
Why write I still all one, ever the same,
And keep invention in a noted weed,[3]
That every word doth almost tell[4] my name,
Showing their birth, and where[5] they did proceed?
O know, sweet love, I always write of you,
And you and love are still my argument,
So all my best is dressing old words new,
Spending again what is already spent:
For as the sun is daily new and old,
So is my love still telling what is told.

81

Or[6] I shall live your epitaph to make,
Or you survive when I in earth am rotten,
From hence[7] your memory death cannot take,
Although in me each part[8] will be forgotten.
Your name from hence immortal life shall have,
Though I (once gone) to all the world must die;
The earth can yield me but a common grave,
When you entombèd in men's eyes shall lie.
Your monument shall be my gentle verse,
Which eyes not yet created shall o'er-read,
And tongues to be, your being shall rehearse,[9]
When all the breathers of this world are dead,
You still shall live (such virtue[10] hath my pen)
Where breath most breathes, even in the mouths of men.

87

Farewell, thou art too dear for my possessing,
And like enough thou know'st thy estimate,[11]
The charter of thy worth gives thee releasing,[12]
My bonds in thee are all determinate.[13]
For how do I hold thee but by thy granting,
And for that riches where is my deserving?
The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
And so my patent[14] back again is swerving.
Thyself thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
Or me, to whom thou gav'st it, else mistaking,
So thy great gift, upon misprision[15] growing,
Comes home again, on better judgment making.
Thus have I had thee as a dream doth flatter:
In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

89

Say that thou didst forsake me for some fault,
And I will comment upon that offence;
Speak of my lameness, and I straight will halt,[16]
Against thy reasons making no defence.
Thou canst not (love) disgrace me half so ill,

---

[1] choirs the part of a church occupied by the choir; the 1609 edition spells this "quiers," which may allude to "quires," the gatherings of manuscript leaves upon which the poet prints his verse.
[2] time fashion.
[3] noted weed familiar clothing or structure.
[4] tell The 1609 edition has "fel" or "sel" (with an elongated s).
[5] where whence.
[6] Or whether.
[7] From hence from these lines.
[8] in me each part each of my (or your) parts or features.
[9] tongues to be future tongues; rehearse repeat.
[10] virtue merit and strength.
[11] estimate worth.
[12] The charter … releasing i.e., the legal document or contract which notes your worth releases you.
[13] determinate ended.
[14] patent title to possession (of you).
[15] misprision error.
[16] halt both stop and limp.

To set a form upon desired change,
As I'll myself disgrace, knowing thy will,
I will acquaintance strangle and look strange,[1]
Be absent from thy walks, and in my tongue
Thy sweet belovèd name no more shall dwell,
Lest I (too much profane) should do it wrong,
And haply[2] of our old acquaintance tell.
For thee, against myself I'll vow debate,[3]
For I must ne'er love him whom thou dost hate.

90

Then hate me when thou wilt, if ever, now,
Now while the world is bent my deeds to cross,
Join with the spite of fortune, make me bow,
And do not drop in for an after-loss.[4]
Ah, do not, when my heart hath 'scaped this sorrow,
Come in the rearward of a conquered woe;[5]
Give not a windy night a rainy morrow,
To linger out a purposed overthrow.
If thou wilt leave me, do not leave me last,
When other petty griefs have done their spite,
But in the onset come, so shall I taste
At first the very worst of fortune's might.
And other strains of woe, which now seem woe,
Compared with loss of thee, will not seem so.

91

Some glory in their birth, some in their skill,
Some in their wealth, some in their body's force,
Some in their garments, though new-fangled ill,[6]
Some in their hawks and hounds, some in their horse.
And every humour hath his adjunct[7] pleasure,
Wherein it finds a joy above the rest,
But these particulars are not my measure,
All these I better in one general best.
Thy love is better[8] than high birth to me,
Richer than wealth, prouder than garments' cost,
Of more delight than hawks or horses be;
And having thee, of all men's pride I boast.
Wretched in this alone, that thou mayst take
All this away, and me most wretched make.

94

They that have pow'r to hurt, and will do none,
That do not do the thing they most do show,[9]
Who moving others, are themselves as stone,
Unmovèd, cold, and to temptation slow:
They rightly do inherit Heaven's graces,
And husband nature's riches from expense,[10]
They are the lords and owners of their faces,
Others but stewards[11] of their excellence.
The summer's flow'r is to the summer sweet,
Though to itself it only live and die,[12]
But if that flow'r with base infection meet,
The basest weed outbraves his dignity:[13]
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds;
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.[14]

99

The forward violet thus did I chide:[15]
Sweet thief, whence didst thou steal thy sweet that smells
If not from my love's breath? The purple pride,
Which on thy soft cheek for complexion dwells,
In my love's veins thou hast too grossly dyed.
The lily I condemnèd for thy hand,[16]
And buds of marjoram had stol'n thy hair,

---

[1] acquaintance strangle end our relationship; strange like a stranger.
[2] haply by chance.
[3] debate argument, war.
[4] after-loss second or later loss.
[5] Come … woe i.e., attack right after I have conquered sorrow.
[6] new-fangled ill fashionably ugly.
[7] humour temperament; adjunct associated.
[8] better The 1609 edition has "bitter."
[9] show appear to do.
[10] husband protect, keep; expense being expended, used up, wasted.
[11] stewards keepers, managers.
[12] Though … die i.e., though it remain unpollinated.
[13] outbraves his dignity i.e., defies or surpasses the flower's nobleness or worthiness.
[14] Lilies … weeds This line appears in The Reign of King Edward III, an anonymous play printed in 1596, sometimes attributed to Shakespeare.
[15] This is an extra introductory line to a regular sonnet.
[16] condemnèd for thy hand i.e., blamed for stealing the colour of thy hand.

The roses fearfully on thorns did stand,
One[1] blushing shame, another white despair;
A third, nor red nor white, had stol'n of both,
And to his robb'ry had annexed thy breath,
But for his theft in pride of all his growth
A vengeful canker eat him up to death.
More flowers I noted, yet I none could see
But sweet or colour it had stol'n from thee.

102

My love is strengthened, though more weak in seeming,
I love not less, though less the show appear;
That love is merchandized[2] whose rich esteeming
The owner's tongue doth publish everywhere.
Our love was new, and then but in the spring,
When I was wont to greet it with my lays,
As Philomel[3] in summer's front doth sing,
And stops her[4] pipe in growth of riper days:
Not that the summer is less pleasant now
Than when her mournful hymns did hush the night,
But that wild music burthens[5] every bough,
And sweets grown common lose their dear delight.
Therefore like her, I sometime hold my tongue,
Because I would not dull you with my song.

106

When in the chronicle of wasted time
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,[6]
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme
In praise of ladies dead, and lovely knights,
Then in the blazon[7] of sweet beauty's best,
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
I see their antique pen would have expressed
Even such a beauty as you master now.
So all their praises are but prophecies
Of this our time, all you prefiguring,
And for they looked but with divining[8] eyes,
They had not skill[9] enough your worth to sing:
For we which now behold these present days,
Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments;[10] love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover to remove.
Oh no, it is an ever-fixèd mark[11]
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wand'ring bark,[12]
Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.[13]
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his[14] bending sickle's compass come;
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.[15]
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

128

How oft when thou, my music, music play'st
Upon that blessèd wood whose motion[16] sounds
With thy sweet fingers when thou gently sway'st
The wiry concord that mine ear confounds,
Do I envy those jacks[17] that nimble leap
To kiss the tender inward of thy hand,

---

[1] One The 1609 edition has "our."

[2] merchandized made into merchandise.

[3] Philomel generally stands for the nightingale; in a Latin myth, Philomela was raped by Tereus, who cut out her tongue to keep her quiet; she was turned into a nightingale.

[4] her The 1609 edition has "his."

[5] burthens weighs down, but also referring to a musical refrain or accompaniment, the "bourdon."

[6] wights people.

[7] blazon a poetic catalogue of features or virtues.

[8] for because; divining prophetic.

[9] skill "still" in the 1609 edition.

[10] Let me … impediments This recalls the traditional marriage service.

[11] fixèd mark an unmoving mark on sea or land to help navigation.

[12] bark boat.

[13] the star … taken Stars were used to help navigation; here, their height can be measured, but not their importance or essence.

[14] his time's.

[15] doom doomsday.

[16] motion mechanism.

[17] jacks keys to a virginal or harpsichord; jacks were in fact not the keys themselves, but pieces of wood fitted to the ends of the keys; the jack rose when the key was pressed, and an attached quill then plucked the strings.

Whilst my poor lips, which should that harvest reap,
At the wood's boldness by thee blushing stand.
To be so tickled they would change their state
And situation with those dancing chips,
O'er whom thy fingers walk with gentle gait,
Making dead wood more blest than living lips:
Since saucy jacks so happy are in this,
Give them thy[1] fingers, me thy lips to kiss.

129

Th'expense[2] of spirit in a waste of shame
Is lust in action, and till action, lust
Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust,
Enjoyed no sooner but despisèd straight,
Past reason hunted, and no sooner had
Past reason hated as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad.
Mad in pursuit and in possession so,
Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme,
A bliss in proof, and proved, a very woe,[3]
Before, a joy proposed, behind, a dream.
All this the world well knows, yet none knows well
To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun,
Coral is far more red than her lips' red,
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun,[4]
If hairs be wires,[5] black wires grow on her head;
I have seen roses damasked,[6] red and white,
But no such roses see I in her cheeks,
And in some perfumes is there more delight
Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
I grant I never saw a goddess go,
My mistress when she walks treads on the ground.
And yet by Heaven I think my love as rare
As any she belied with false compare.[7]

135

Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will,[8]
And Will to boot, and Will in overplus;
More than enough am I that vex thee still,
To thy sweet will making addition thus.
Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,
Not once vouchsafe to hide my will in thine?
Shall will in others seem right gracious,
And in my will no fair acceptance shine?
The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,
And in abundance addeth to his store,
So thou being rich in Will add to thy Will
One will of mine to make thy large Will more.
Let no unkind, no fair beseechers kill,[9]
Think all but one, and me in that one Will.

138

When my love swears that she is made of truth,
I do believe her though I know she lies,
That she might think me some untutored youth,
Unlearnèd in the world's false subtleties.
Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,
Simply I credit her false-speaking tongue,
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?
And wherefore say not I that I am old?
Oh love's best habit is in seeming trust,[10]

---

[1] thy The first "thy" in this line is "their" in the 1609 edition.
[2] expense expenditure.
[3] in proof in the attempt; and proved, a very woe The 1609 edition has "and proud and very wo."
[4] dun dingy brown.
[5] hairs be wires a traditional comparison (usually to gold wires).
[6] damasked variegated.
[7] she woman; belied misrepresented; compare comparison.
[8] Will The sonnet puns on the possible meanings of will: the name Will; desire (sexual or otherwise); pleasure; capacity to choose; intent or purpose; testament; penis; and even vagina (line 5). It echoes the proverb, "A woman will have her will." Italics from the 1609 edition have been kept for this sonnet.
[9] Let … kill i.e., let no unkindness kill your fair suitors.
[10] seeming trust appearing trustworthy.

And age in love loves not t'have years told.
Therefore I lie with[1] her, and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flattered be.

143

Lo as a careful[2] housewife runs to catch
One of her feathered creatures broke away,
Sets down her babe and makes all swift dispatch
In pursuit of the thing she would have stay:
Whilst her neglected child holds her in chase,
Cries to catch her whose busy care is bent
To follow that which flies before her face,
Not prizing[3] her poor infant's discontent:
So run'st thou after that which flies from thee,
Whilst I, thy babe, chase thee afar behind,
But if thou catch thy hope, turn back to me,
And play the mother's part, kiss me, be kind.
So will I pray that thou mayst have thy Will,[4]
If thou turn back and my loud crying still.

144

Two loves I have of comfort and despair,
Which like two spirits do suggest[5] me still:
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill.[6]
To win me soon to hell, my female evil
Tempteth my better angel from my side,[7]
And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
Wooing his purity with her foul pride.
And whether that my angel be turned fiend
Suspect I may, yet not directly tell,
But being both from me, both to each friend,[8]
I guess one angel in another's hell.
Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire[9] my good one out.

145[10]

Those lips that Love's own hand did make
Breathed forth the sound that said "I hate"
To me that languished for her sake;
But when she saw my woeful state,
Straight in her heart did mercy come,
Chiding that tongue that, ever sweet,
Was used in giving gentle doom,[11]
And taught it thus anew to greet:
"I hate" she altered with an end
That followed it as gentle day
Doth follow night, who like a fiend
From Heaven to Hell is flown away.
"I hate" from hate away she threw,[12]
And saved my life saying "not you."

146

Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
My sinful earth these rebel pow'rs that thee array,[13]
Why dost thou pine within and suffer dearth,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion[14] spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge? Is this thy body's end?
Then, soul, live thou upon thy servant's[15] loss,
And let that pine to aggravate thy store;[16]
Buy terms divine in selling hours of dross;
Within be fed, without be rich no more:
So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

---

[1] lie with lie down with; tell lies to.
[2] careful full of cares.
[3] prizing noticing.
[4] Will See the punning of sonnet 135. Italics are from the 1609 edition.
[5] suggest prompt or influence.
[6] ill dark.
[7] side The 1609 edition has "sight."
[8] both … friend i.e., both away from me, and friends to each other.
[9] fire drives; this could also refer to the burning of a venereal infection.
[10] Note that this poem is in iambic tetrameter.
[11] doom judgement.
[12] "I hate" … threw i.e., took the "hate" out of the meaning of "I hate"; "hate away" is a possible pun on Shakespeare's wife's last name, Hathaway.
[13] My sinful earth The 1609 quarto repeats "My sinful earth" here, which is likely an error; it is unknown what else might be inserted here; rebel pow'rs that thee array i.e., the rebellious flesh that clothes you.
[14] mansion the body.
[15] thy servant's the body's.
[16] And let … store i.e., and let that languish or starve to increase the soul's store.

147

My love is as a fever, longing still
For that which longer nurseth the disease,
Feeding on that which doth preserve the ill,
Th'uncertain sickly appetite to please;
My reason, the physician to my love,
Angry that his prescriptions are not kept,
Hath left me, and I desperate now approve[1]
Desire is death, which physic did except.[2]
Past cure I am, now reason is past care,[3]
And frantic mad with evermore unrest;
My thoughts and my discourse as madmen's are,
At random from the truth vainly expressed.
For I have sworn thee fair, and thought thee bright,
Who art as black as hell, as dark as night.

151

Love is too young to know what conscience is,[4]
Yet who knows not conscience is born of love?
Then, gentle cheater, urge not my amiss,[5]
Lest guilty of my faults thy sweet self prove.
For thou betraying me, I do betray
My nobler part to my gross body's treason;
My soul doth tell my body that he may
Triumph in love; flesh stays[6] no farther reason,
But rising at the name doth point out thee
As his triumphant prize. Proud of his pride,
He is contented thy poor drudge to be,
To stand[7] in thy affairs, fall by thy side.
No want[8] of conscience hold it that I call
Her love, for whose dear love I rise and fall.

154

The little love-god, lying once asleep,
Laid by his side his heart-inflaming brand,[9]
Whilst many nymphs that vowed chaste life to keep
Came tripping by, but in her maiden hand
The fairest votary took up that fire,
Which many legions of true hearts had warmed,
And so the general of hot desire
Was sleeping by a virgin hand disarmed.
This brand she quenchèd in a cool well by,[10]
Which from love's fire took heat perpetual,
Growing[11] a bath and healthful remedy
For men diseased, but I, my mistress' thrall,[12]
Came there for cure, and this[13] by that I prove:
Love's fire heats water, water cools not love.

—1609

---

[1] approve show that.

[2] Desire … except i.e., desire which refuses physic or medicine leads to death.

[3] This line plays with the proverb, "Past cure, past care."

[4] Love … is Love or Cupid is a young boy, and therefore cannot have a moral sense (or carnal knowledge).

[5] urge not my amiss i.e., do not stress or provoke my fault.

[6] flesh the body in general, the penis in particular; stays waits for.

[7] stand serve.

[8] want lack.

[9] brand torch or fire; that which brands or marks the lovers.

[10] by nearby.

[11] Growing becoming.

[12] thrall slave or captive.

[13] this the following statement.

Michael Drayton
1563-1631

Michael Drayton had a long career as a poet, writing in a variety of genres and collaborating on stage plays. He revised and expanded many of his texts a number of times. The editions of his works presented here reveal his early attempts in three different genres. Pastoral modes were popular in the 1590s and the third eclogue of The Shepherds' Garland echoes the April and October sections of Edmund Spenser's Shepheardes Calender a number of times. Drayton also contributed to the sonnet vogue of the period, but he continued to rewrite and amend his sequence long after the genre's popularity had waned; only twenty of the original 51 sonnets in Ideas Mirror of 1594 found their way into the 1619 edition, which expanded to 63 sonnets. England's Heroical Epistles, a series of epistolary poems between famous English lovers, are notable for their closed couplets, and were very successful, running through five editions between 1597 and 1602. The form is loosely based on Ovid's Heroides and gained Drayton the title of "our English Ovid." Although he draws on Ovid, Drayton is clearly writing about English figures, and cites such historical sources as Raphael Holinshed and Edward Hall (also used by Shakespeare in a number of plays). The set of epistles presented here, from Lady Jane Gray and Lord Gilford Dudley, were the most quoted in the period.

EDITIONS: "The Third Eclogue" from Idea, the shepheard's garland, Fashioned in nine eglogs. Rowlands sacrifice to the nine Muses. London: [By T. Orwin] for Thomas Woodcock, 1593. STC 7202; Ideas mirrour, Amours in quatorzains. London: Printed by James Roberts, for Nicholas Ling, 1594. STC 7203; Englands heroicall epistles. London: Printed by J[ames] R[oberts] for N. Ling, 1597. STC 7193.

from The Shepherds' Garland

The Third Eclogue[1]

Rowland and Perkin both yfere,[2]
in field upon a day,
With little Robin-redbreasts round,
do pass the time away.

PERKIN.

Rowland for shame awake thy drowsy muse,
Time plays the hunts-up to thy sleepy head,
Why li'st thou here as thou hadst long been dead,
foul idle swain?[3]

Whoever heard thy pipe and pleasing vein,
And doth but hear this scurrill[4] minstralcy,
These noninos[5] of filthy ribaldry,
that doth not muse.[6]

Then slumber not with foul Endymion,[7]
But tune thy reed to dapper virelays,[8]
And sing awhile of blessed Beta's[9] praise, fair Beta she:

In thy sweet song so blessed may'st thou be,
For learned Collin lays his pipes to gage,[10]
And is to fairy gone a pilgrimage:
the more our moan.

---

1 Eclogue a short poem, especially a pastoral dialogue.
2 yfere companions.
3 swain a young man, a shepherd.
4 scurrill scurrilous or noted by indecent, lewd language.
5 noninos "nonny-no" was used as a meaningless refrain in songs.
6 muse "amuse," or perhaps, "inspire."
7 Endymion Loved by the moon, Selene, Endymion was thrown into a perpetual sleep, and the moon descended every night to embrace him.
8 virelays short lyric pieces with stanzas of two rhymes.
9 Beta Queen Elizabeth.
10 Collin Edmund Spenser, author of The Shepheardes Calendar. In the next two lines, Perkins states Spenser has left the pastoral mode to go to "fairy": the first part of Spenser's epic Faerie Queene appeared in 1590; to gage to pledge, a promise of performance.

ROWLAND.

What, Beta? Shepherd, she is Pan's[1] beloved.
Fair Beta's praise beyond our strain doth stretch,
Her notes too high for my poor pipe to reach,
poor oaten reed:[2]

So far unfit to speak of worthy's deed,
But set my stops unto a lower key,
Whereas a horn-pipe I may safely play,
yet unreproved.

With flattery my Muse could never fage,[3]
Nor could affect such vain scurrility,
To please lewd lorrels,[4] in their foolery,
too base and vile:

Nor but a note yet will I raise my style,[5]
Myself above Will Piper to advance,
Which so bestirs him at the morris dance,[6]
for penny wage.

PERKIN.

Rowland, so toys oft times esteemed are,
And fashions ever changing with the time,
Then frolic it a while in lusty rhyme,
with mirth and glee:

And let me hear that roundelay[7] of thee,
Which once thou sangst to me in Janeveer,[8]
When Robin-redbreast sitting on a brier, the burthen bear.[9]

ROWLAND.

Well needs I must, yet with a heavy heart:
But were not Beta sure[10] I would not sing,
Whose praise the echoes never cease to ring unto the skies.

PERKIN.

Be blithe good Rowland then, and clear thine eyes:
And now sith Robin to his roost is gone,
Good Rowland then supply the place alone,
and show thy art.

ROWLAND.

"O thou fair silver Thames, O clearest crystal flood,
Beta alone the phoenix[11] is of all thy watery brood,
The Queen of Virgins only she,
And thou the queen of floods shalt be:
Let all thy nymphs be joyful then to see this happy day,
Thy Beta now alone shall be the subject of my lay.

"With dainty and delightsome strains of sweetest virelays,
Come lovely shepherds sit we down and chant our Beta's praise,
And let us sing so rare a verse,
Our Beta's praises to rehearse,
That little birds shall silent be to hear poor shepherds sing,
And rivers backward bend their course and flow unto the spring.

"Range all thy swans, fair Thames, together on a rank,[12]
And place them duly one by one upon thy stately bank,
Then set together all agood,[13]

---

[1] Pan a Greek rural deity, often pictured with the head, arms, and trunk of a man and the lower parts of a goat; he presided over shepherds and flocks and delighted in rural music (associated with the "oaten reed" of this stanza).

[2] This is a traditional lament of the pastoral poet, who fears it is indecorous to speak of royalty in humble verse. However, the pastoral was traditionally a genre used to discuss politics covertly.

[3] fage toil.

[4] lorrels rogues, worthless people.

[5] style the manner of expression, and the pen.

[6] morris dance a rustic dance associated with fantastic movements and costumes, especially bells, and often performed at Whit Sunday (the seventh Sunday after Easter).

[7] roundelay short, simple song with a refrain.

[8] Janeveer January.

[9] the burthen bear "to bear the burthen" means to sing the bass accompaniment or undersong, or to sing the chorus; brier a thorny bush or wildrose bush.

[10] were not Beta sure i.e., if it were not Beta.

[11] phoenix The phoenix is a beautiful, mythical bird, the only one of its kind. It lives for approximately 500 years in the Arabian desert, when it burns itself to death, only to rise with renewed youth from its own ashes.

[12] on a rank in a row.

[13] agood in good earnest, thoroughly.

Recording to the silver flood,
And crave the tuneful nightingale to help you with her lay,
The osel and the throstlecock,[1] chief music of our May.

"O see what troops of nymphs been sporting on the strands,
And they been blessed nymphs of peace, with olives in their hands.
How merrily the Muses sing,
That all the flow'ry meadows ring,
And Beta sits upon the bank, in purple and in pall,[2]
And she the Queen of Muses is and wears the corinall.[3]

"Trim up her golden tresses with Apollo's sacred tree,[4]
O happy sight unto all those that love and honour thee,
The blessed angels have prepared,
A glorious crown for thy reward,
Not such a golden crown as haughty Caesar wears,
But such a glittering starry crown as Ariadne[5] bears.

"Make her a goodly chapilet[6] of azured colombine,
And wreath about her coronet with sweetest eglantine:
Bedeck our Beta all with lilies,
And the dainty daffodillies,
With roses damask, white, and red, and fairest flower delice,[7]
With cowslips of Jerusalem, and cloves of Paradise.

"O thou fair torch of heaven, the day's most dearest light,
And thou bright-shining Cynthia,[8] the glory of the night:
You stars the eyes of heaven,
And thou the gliding levin,[9]
And thou O gorgeous Iris[10] with all strange colours dyed,
When she[11] streams forth her rays, then dashed is all your pride.

"See how the day stands still, admiring of her face,
And time lo stretcheth forth her arms, thy Beta to embrace,
The Sirens[12] sing sweet lays,
The Tritons[13] sound her praise,
Go pass on, Thames, and hie thee fast unto the ocean sea,
And let thy billows there proclaim thy Beta's holy-day.

"And water thou the blessed root of that green olive tree,
With whose sweet shadow all thy banks with peace preserved be,
Laurel for poets and conquerors,
And myrtle[14] for love's paramours,
That fame may be thy fruit, the boughs preserved by peace,
And let the mournful cypress[15] die, now storms and tempests cease.

"We'll straw[16] the shore with pearl where Beta walks alone,
And we will pave her princely bower with richest Indian stone,

---

1 osel and the throstlecock ouzel or blackbird; the throstlecock is the male song thrush.
2 pall a rich robe or mantle.
3 corinall coronal, a crown; the same as coronet.
4 Apollo's sacred tree the laurel, whose leaves were an emblem of victory and distinction.
5 Ariadne In some versions of the myth, Ariadne provided Theseus not with a thread, but with a wreath which lit his way through the Labyrinth. Theseus took Ariadne to Naxos, where he deserted her, and where Dionysus found her. Dionysus set her wreath in the heavens, where it became the constellation Corona.
6 chapilet string or wreath.
7 damask weave with rich designs. This could also refer to the variegated colour of the red and white roses; delice delight, pleasure.
8 Cynthia the moon.
9 levin bright flash of light or flame, lightning.
10 Iris a messenger of the gods whose symbol is the rainbow.
11 she Beta.
12 Sirens mythical creatures, part woman, part bird, who lure sailors to destruction with enchanted singing.
13 Tritons a race of sea monsters or sea deities in semi-human form.
14 myrtle sacred to Venus and an emblem of love.
15 cypress symbolizes mourning.
16 straw scatter.

Perfume the air and make it sweet,
For such a goddess it is meet,
For if her eyes for purity contend with Titan's[1] light,
No marvel then although they so do dazzle human sight.

"Sound out your trumpets then from London's stately towers,
To beat the stormy winds aback and calm the raging showers,
Set to the cornet and the flute,
The orpharyon[2] and the lute,
And tune the tabor[3] and the pipe to the sweet violins,
And move the thunder in the air with loudest clarions.[4]

"Beta, long may thine altars smoke with yearly sacrifice,
And long thy sacred temples may their Sabbaths solemnize,
Thy shepherds watch by day and night,
Thy maids attend the holy light,
And thy large empire stretch her arms from east unto the west,
And thou under thy feet mayst tread that foul seven-headed beast."[5]

PERKIN.

Thanks, gentle Rowland, for my roundelay,
And blessed be Beta, burthen of thy song,
The shepherds' goddess may she flourish long,
O happy she.

Her years and days thrice doubled may they be.
Triumphing Albion[6] clap thy hands for joy,
And pray the heavens may shield her from annoy,
so will I pray.

ROWLAND.

So do, and when my milk-white ewes have yeaned,[7]
Beta shall have the firstling of the fold;
I'll burnish all his horns with finest gold,
and paint his fleece with purple grain.[8]

PERKIN.

Believe me as I am true shepherds' swain,
Then for thy love all other I forsake,
And unto thee myself I will betake,
with faith unfeigned.

Ipse ego thura dabo, fumosis candidus aris:
Ipse feram ante tuos munera vota pedes.[9]

—1593

from Idea's Mirror[10]

My heart imprisoned in a hopeless isle,
Peopled with armies of pale jealous eyes,
The shores beset with thousand secret spies,
Must pass by air or else die in exile.
He framed him wings with feathers of his thought,[11]
Which by their nature learned to mount the sky,

[1] Titan the sun god.

[2] orpharyon The name of this instrument combines the names of two mythical musicians, Orpheus and Arion. It is similar to a large lute.

[3] tabor a small drum.

[4] clarion a type of trumpet used in war, loud and clear.

[5] seven-headed beast See Revelation 12:3 for "a great red dragon, having seven heads," a figure of Satan. It is also an allusion to the seven hills of Rome (and thus Roman Catholicism).

[6] Albion England.

[7] yeaned given birth to lambs.

[8] grain dye.

[9] from Ovid's Amores 2.13, 23-24. Marlowe's translation (1602) of Ovid reads: "In white, with incense I'll thine altars greet, / Myself will bring vowed gifts before thy feet."

[10] This title was shortened to Idea in 1599; editions of 1600, 1602, 1605, and 1619 retain the shortened title. Only 20 of the 51 original sonnets from the 1594 edition made it into the 1619 Idea, which expanded to 63 sonnets. "My heart imprisoned" appeared in all editions but that of 1619; all of the other sonnets selected here appeared in all editions.

[11] The pattern follows the story of Icarus, who attempted to fly with wings of wax and feathers. When he flew too close to the sun, his wings melted and he plunged into the Aegean sea.

And with the same he practised to fly,
Till he himself this eagle's art had taught.
Thus soaring still, not looking once below,
So near thine eyes' celestial sun aspired,
That with the rays his wasting pinions[1] fired.
Thus was the wanton cause of his own woe.
Down fell he in thy beauty's ocean drenched,
Yet there he burns, in fire that's never quenched.

Some wits there be which like my method well,
And say my verse runs in a lofty vein,
Some say I have a passing[2] pleasing strain,
Some say that in my humour I excel.
Some, who reach not the height of my conceit,
They say (as poets do) I use to feign,
And in bare words paint out my passions' pain.
Thus sundry men their sundry minds repeat.
I pass not,[3] I, how men affected be,
Nor who commend or discommend my verse,
It pleaseth me if I my plaints rehearse,
And in my lines if she my love may see.
I prove my verse authentic still in this:
Who writes my mistress' praise, can never write amiss.

Why do I speak of joy or write of love,
When my heart is the very den of horror,
And in my soul the pains of hell I prove,
With all his torments and infernal terror.
Mine eyes want tears thus to bewail my woe,[4]
My brain is dry with weeping all too long,
My sighs be spent with grief and sighing so,[5]
And I want words for to express my wrong.
But still distracted in love's lunacy,
And Bedlam-like[6] thus raving in my grief,
Now rail[7] upon her hair, now on her eye,
Now call her goddess, then I call her thief,
Now I deny her, then I do confess her,
Now do I curse her, then again I bless her.

My heart the anvil where my thoughts do beat,
My words the hammers, fashioning my desire,
My breast the forge, including all the heat,
Love is the fuel which maintains the fire.
My sighs, the bellows which the flame increaseth,
Filling mine ears with noise and nightly groaning,
Toiling with pain, my labour never ceaseth,
In grievous passions my woes still bemoaning.
Mine eyes with tears against the fire striving,
With scorching gleed[8] my heart to cinders turneth,
But with those drops the coals again reviving,
Still more and more unto my torment burneth.
With Sisyphus[9] thus do I roll the stone,
And turn the wheel with damned Ixion.[10]

When first I ended, then I first began,
The more I travel, further from my rest,
Where most I lost, there most of all I wan,[11]
Pined with hunger, rising from a feast.
Methinks I flee, yet want I legs to go,
Wise in conceit, in act a very sot,[12]
Ravished with joy, amidst a hell of woe,

---

1 pinions feathers, wings.
2 passing extremely.
3 pass not care not.
4 The 1619 edition of this line reads "What should I say? What yet remains to do?"
5 with grief and sighing so The 1619 edition reads "in uttering of my woe."
6 Bedlam-like Bedlam is a short form of Bethlehem, the name of a hospital for the mentally insane in London.
7 rail shout at, abuse.
8 gleed live coals or embers.
9 Sisyphus Sisyphus' punishment in the infernal regions was eternally to roll a huge stone up a hill; just as it neared the crest, the stone would roll back down to the plain.
10 Ixion mythical king of Thessaly, who was punished in the infernal regions by being fastened to an eternally revolving wheel.
11 wan won.
12 sot drunken fool.

What most I seem, that surest am I not.
I build my hopes a world above the sky,
Yet with the mole I creep into the earth,
In plenty am I starved with penury,
And yet I surfeit in the greatest dearth.
I have, I want, despair, and yet desire,
Burned in a sea of ice, and drowned amidst a fire.

—1594

from England's Heroical Epistles

The Lady Jane Gray, to the Lord Gilford Dudley.

The Argument

After the death of that virtuous young prince King Edward the Sixth, the son of that famous King Henry the Eighth, Jane, the daughter of Henry Gray, duke of Suffolk, by the consent of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland, was proclaimed Queen of England, being married to Gilford Dudley, the fourth son of the foresaid duke of Northumberland, which match was concluded by their ambitious fathers, who went about by this means to bring the crown unto their children and to dispossess the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of King Henry the Eighth, heir to King Edward her brother. Queen Mary, rising in arms to claim her rightful crown, taketh the said Jane Gray and the Lord Gilford her husband, being lodged in the Tower for their more safety, which place being lastly their palace, by this means becomes their prison; where being severed in sundry prisons, they write these epistles one to another.[1]

Mine own dear lord, sith[2] thou art locked from me,
In this disguise my love must steal to thee,
Since to renew all loves, all kindness past,
This refuge scarcely left, yet this the last.
My keeper coming, I of thee inquire,
Who with thy greeting answers my desire,
Which my tongue willing to return again,
Grief stops my words, and I but strive in vain;
Wherewith amazed, away in haste he goes,
When through my lips my heart thrusts forth my woes;
Whenas the doors, that make a doleful sound,
Drive back my words, that in the noise are drowned,
Which somewhat hushed, the echo doth record,
And twice or thrice reiterates my word;
When like an adverse wind in Isis'[3] course,
Against the tide bending his boist'rous force,
But when the flood hath wrought itself about,
He following on, doth headlong thrust it out:
Thus strive my sighs with tears ere they begin,
And breaking out, again sighs drive them in.
A thousand forms present my troubled thought,
Yet prove abortive when they forth are brought.
From strongest woe we hardly[4] language wrest,
The depth of grief with words is sounded least.
As tears do fall and rise, sighs come and go,
So do these numbers[5] ebb, so do they flow.
These briny tears do make my ink look pale,
My ink clothes tears in this sad mourning vale,[6]
The letters, mourners, weep with my dim eye,

---

[1] This introduction was versified in 1619:
Edward the Sixth his timeless life bereft,
(Though doubtfully) yet his dominion left
To his sister MARY: but by HENRY GRAY,
Then duke of Suffolk, bearing mighty sway,
With the consent, and by the pow'rful hand
Of JOHN, the stout duke of Northumberland,
His fourth son GILFORD DUDLEY, they affied*
To fair JANE GRAY, which by the mother's side
Some title claimed: this marriage them between,
The Lady JANE was here proclaimed Queen.
But MARY soon prevailing by her pow'r,
Causes those two preserved in the Tower,
There to be prisoned; where, their blame to quite,
They each to other these epistles write.

* affied betrothed;  quite quit.

[2] sith since.

[3] Isis Egyptian goddess who represents the female productive force of nature.

[4] hardly with difficulty.

[5] numbers verses.

[6] vale "this vale of woe" was a familiar phrase to describe the world.

The paper pale, grieved at my misery.
Yet miserable ourselves why should we deem,
Sith none is so, but in their own esteem?
Who in distress from resolution flies
Is rightly said to yield to miseries;
That life is only miserable and vile
From which fair patience doth itself exile.
They which begot us did beget this sin,[1]
They first begun what did our grief begin;
We tasted not; 'twas they which did rebel,
Not our offence, but in their fall we fell;
They which a crown would to my lord have linked,
All hope, all life, all liberty extinct;
A subject born, a princess to have been,
Hath made me now nor subject, nor a queen.
Ah vile ambition, how dost thou deceive us,
Which show'st us heav'n, and yet in hell dost leave us?
Seldom untouched doth innocence escape,
When error commeth in good counsel's shape;
A lawful title counterchecks proud might;
The weakest things become strong props to right.
Then my dear lord, although affliction grieve us,
Yet let our spotless innocence relieve us.
Death but an acted passion doth appear,
Where truth gives courage, and the conscience clear,
And let thy comfort thus consist in mine,
That I bear part of whatsoe're is thine;
As when we lived untouched with these disgraces,
When as our kingdom was our dear embraces;
At Durham Palace, where sweet Hymen sang,[2]
Whose buildings with our nuptial music rang;
When prothalamions[3] praised that happy day,
Wherein great Dudley matched with noble Gray,
When they devised to link by wedlock's band,
The house of Suffolk to Northumberland,
Our fatal dukedom to your dukedom bound,
To frame this building on so weak a ground.
For what avails a lawless usurpation,
Which gives a sceptre, but not rules a nation?
Only the surfeit of a vain opinion.
What gives content, gives more than all dominion.
When first mine ears were pierced with the fame[4]
Of Jane, proclaimed by a prince's name,
A sudden fright my trembling heart appals,
The fear of conscience ent'reth iron walls.
Thrice happy for our fathers had it been,
If what we feared, they wisely had foreseen,
And kept a mean gate in an humble path,
To have escaped these furious tempests'[5] wrath.
The cedar-building eagle bears the wind,
And not the falcon, though both hawks by kind;
The kingly bird doth from the clouds command
The fearful fowl that moves but near the land.
Though Mary be from mighty kings descended,
My blood not from Plantagenet pretended;
My grandsire Brandon did our house advance,[6]
By princely Mary, dowager of France;
The fruit of that fair stock, which did combine
And York's sweet branch with Lancaster's entwine,
And in one stalk did happily unite
The pure vermillion rose with purer white:
I, the untimely slip of that rich stem,
Whose golden bud brings forth a diadem.[7]
But oh, forgive me lord, it is not I,

---

[1] <*> They which begot us did beget this sin.
Showing the ambition of the two dukes, their fathers, whose pride was the cause of the utter overthrow of their children. [Drayton's note.]

[2] <*> At Durham Palace, where sweet Hymen sang,
The buildings, &c.
The Lord Gilford Dudley, fourth son to John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, married the Lady Jane Gray, daughter to the Duke of Suffolk, at Durham House in the Strand. [Drayton's note.]

[3] prothalamions preliminary nuptial songs.

[4] <*> When first mine ears were pierced with the fame
Of Jane, proclaimed by a prince's name.
Presently upon the death of King Edward, the Lady Jane was taken as queen, conveyed by water to the Tower of London, for her safety, and after proclaimed in divers parts of the realm, as so ordained by King Edward's Letters patents, and his will. [Drayton's note.]

[5] these furious tempests The 1619 edition reads "the heavens impetuous."

[6] <*> My grandsire Brandon did our house advance,
By princely Mary, dowager of France.
Henry Gray, Duke of Suffolk, married Francis, the eldest daughter of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, by the French queen; by which Francis he had this Lady Jane: This Mary, the French queen, was daughter to King Henry the seventh, by Elizabeth his queen; which happy marriage conjoined the two noble families of Lancaster and York. [Drayton's note.]

[7] diadem crown.

Nor do I boast of this, but learn to die.
Whilst we were as ourselves conjoined then,
Nature to nature, now an alien.
The purest blood polluted is in blood,
Nearest contemned, if sov'reignty withstood.
A diadem once dazzling the eye,
The day too dark to see affinity;[1]
And where the arm is stretched to reach a crown,
Friendship is broke, the dearest things thrown down:
For what great Henry most strove to avoid,[2]
The heavens have built, what earth would have destroyed.
And seating Edward on his regal throne,
He gives to Mary all that was his own,
By death assuring what by life is theirs,
The lawful claim of Henry's lawful heirs.
By mortal laws the bond may be divorced,
But Heaven's decree by no means can be forced:
That rules the case, when men have all decreed;
Who took him hence knew well who should succeed.
In vain be counsels, statutes, human laws,
When chief of counsels pleads the justest cause.
Thus rule the heavens in their continual course;
That yields to fate that doth not yield to force.
Man's wit doth build for time but to devour,
But virtue's free from time and fortune's power.
What virtue gets, once got, doth never waste,
And having this, this thou forever hast.
Then, my kind lord, sweet Gilford, be not grieved;
The soul is heavenly, and from Heaven relieved.
And as we once have plighted troth together,
Now let us make exchange of minds to either:
To thy fair breast take my resolved mind,
Armed against black despair and all her kind;
And to my bosom breathe that soul of thine,
There to be made as perfect as is mine;
So shall our faiths as firmly be approved,
As I of thee, or thou of me beloved.
This life, no life, wert thou not dear to me,
Nor this no death, were I not woe for thee.
Thou my dear husband, and my lord before,
But truly learn to die, thou shalt be more.
Now live by prayer, on Heaven fix all thy thought,
And surely find what ere by zeal is sought;
For each good motion that the soul awakes,
A heavenly figure sees, from whence it takes
That sweet resemblance, which by power of kind,
Forms (like itself) an image in the mind,
And in our faith the operations be
Of that divineness, which by faith we see,
Which never errs, but accidentally,
By our frail flesh's imbecility,
By each temptation over-apt to slide,
Except our spirit becomes our bodies' guide.
For as our bodies' prisons be these towers,
So to our souls, these bodies be of ours,
Whose fleshly walls hinder that heavenly light,
As these stone walls deprive our wished sight.
Death is the key which unlocks misery,
And lets them out to blessed liberty.
Then draw thy forces all unto thy heart,
The strongest fortress of this earthly part,
And on these three let thy assurance lie:
On faith, repentance, and humility.
Humility to heaven the step, the stair,
Is for devotion, sacrifice, and prayer;
The next place doth to true repentance fall,
A salve, a comfort, and a cordial.
He that hath that, the keys of Heaven hath,
That is the guide, that is the port, the path;
Faith is thy fort, thy shield, thy strongest aid,
Never controlled, ne're yielded, ne're dismayed,
Which doth dilate, unfold, foretell, expresseth,
Which gives rewards, investeth, and possesseth.
Then thank the Heaven, preparing us this room,
Crowning our heads with glorious martyrdom,
Before the black and dismal days begin,
The days of all idolatry and sin,
Not suffering us to see that wicked age,
When persecution vehemently shall rage,

---

[1] affinity relations by marriage.

[2] <*> For what great Henry most strove to avoid.
Noting the distrust that King Henry the eighth ever had in the Princess Mary, his daughter, fearing she should alter the state of religion in the land by matching with a stranger, confessing the right that King Henry's issue had to the crown. [Drayton's note.]

When tyranny new tortures shall invent,
Inflicting vengeance on the innocent.
Yet Heav'n forbids that Mary's womb shall bring England's fair sceptre to a foreign king,
But unto fair Elizabeth shall leave it,[1]
Which broken, hurt, and wounded shall receive it,
And on her temples having placed the crown,
Root out the dregs idolatry hath sown;
And Sion's[2] glory shall again restore,
Laid ruin, waste, and desolate before,
And from black cinders, and rude heaps of stones,
Shall gather up the martyrs' scattered bones,
And shall extirp[3] the pow'r of Rome again,
And cast aside the heavy yoke of Spain.
Farewell, sweet Gilford, know our end is near;
Heaven is our home; we are but strangers here.
Let us make haste to go unto the blest,
Which from these weary worldly labours rest,
And with these lines, my dearest lord, I greet thee,
Until in heaven thy Jane again shall meet thee.

The Lord Gilford Dudley to the Lady Jane Gray

Thus from the strongest treble-walled tower,
Swan-like I sing, before my dying hour.
Oh, if there were such power but in my verse,
As in these woes my wounded heart do pierce,
Stones taking sense, th'obdurate flint that hears,
Should at my plaints dissolve itself to tears.
Lend me a tear, I'll pay thee with a tear,
And interest too, if thou the stock[4] forbear;
Woe, for a woe, and for thy interest loan,
I will return thee frankly, two for one.
I'll give thee hours of woe and years of sorrow,
And turn the day to night, the night to morrow,
And if thou think'st time yet doth pass too soon,
When evening comes, we'll make it but our noon;
And if a grief prove weak and not of force,
I will exchange a better for a worse;
And if thou think too quickly sorrow ends,
Another twice so long shall make amends.
Perhaps thou'lt judge, in such extremes as these,
That words of comfort might far better please,
But such strange power in thy perfection liveth,
As smiles in tears and tears in gladness giveth.
Yet think not Jane that cowardly I faint,
As begging mercy by this sad complaint,
Or yet suppose my courage daunted so
That thou should'st stand betwixt me and my foe,
That grim-aspected death should now control
And seem so fearful to my parting soul,
For were one life a thousand lives to me,
Yet were all those too few to die with thee,
When thou thy woes so patiently dost bear,
As if in death no cause of sorrow were,
And no more dost life's dissolution shun,
Than if cold age his longest course had run.
Thou which[5] did'st once give comfort to my woe,
Now art alone become my comfort's foe;
Not that I leave wherein I did delight,
But that thou art debarred my wished sight;
For if I speak and would complain my wrong,
Straightways thy name doth come into my tongue,
And thou art present as thou still did'st lie
Or in my heart, or[6] in my lips or eye.
No evil planet reigned at thy birth,
Nor was that hour prodigious here on earth;
No fatal mark of froward[7] destiny
Could be divined in thy nativity;
'Tis only I that did thy fall devise,
And thou by me art made a sacrifice;
As in the East, whereas the loving wives
Do with their husbands ever end their lives,
And crowned with garlands, in their brides' attire,

---

1 <*> But unto ... leave it A prophecy of Queen Mary's barrenness and of the happy and glorious reign of Queen Elizabeth, her restoring of religion, the abolishing of the Romish servitude, and casting aside the yoke of Spain. [Drayton's note.]

2 Sion Sion or Zion, the name of one of the hills of Jerusalem, on which the city of David was built, and which became the centre of Jewish life and worship; used allusively for the household of God (the Protestant church).

3 extirp extirpate, root out, destroy.

4 stock capital or principal (as distinguished from interest).

5 which who.

6 Or ... or either ... or.

7 froward adverse, contrary.

Go with their husbands to that holy fire;
And she unworthy thought to live of all
Whom fear of death or danger doth appal.[1]
I boast not of Northumberland's great name,
(Nor of Ket's conquest, which adorns the same)[2]
When he to Norfolk led his troops from far,
And yoked the rebels in the chain of war,
When our white-bear did furiously respire[3]
The flames that singed their villages with fire,
And brought sweet peace in safety to our doors,
Yet left our fame upon the eastern shores;
Nor of my princely brothers, which might grace[4]
And plant true honour in the Dudley's race;
Nor of Gray's match, my children borne by thee,[5]
Allied to York and Lancaster should be;
But of thy virtues proudly boast I dare,
That she is mine, whom all perfections are.
I craved no kingdom, though I thee did crave,
And having thee, I wished no more to have.
Yet let me say how, ere this fortune fell,
Me thinks a crown should have becomed thee well;
Me thinks thy wisdom was ordained alone
To bless a sceptre, beautify a throne;[6]
Thy lips a sacred oracle retain,
Wherein all holy prophecies remain.
More highly prized thy virtues were to me,
Than crowns, than kingdoms, or than sceptres be;
So chaste thy love, so innocent thy life,
As wifed virgin, and a maided wife;
The greatest gifts that heaven could give me here,
Nothing so sweet, so good, so pure, so dear.
This was the joy wherein we lived of late,
Ere worldly cares did us excruciate,
Before these troubles did our peace confound,
Or war, or weapon, massacre, or wound,
Ere dreadful armies did disturb our shores,
Or walls were shaken with the cannons' roars.
Suspect bewrays[7] our thoughts, betrays our words,
One crown is guarded with a thousand swords;
To mean estate but common woes are shown,
But crowns have cares that ever be unknown,
And we by them are to those dangers led,
Of which the least we are experienced.
When Dudley led his armies to the east,[8]
Of all the bosom of the land possesst,[9]
What earthly comfort was it that he lacked,
That with a council's warranty was backed?[10]
That had a kingdom, and the power of laws,
Still to maintain the justice of his cause?
And with the clergy's help, the common's aid,
In every place the peopled kingdom swayed?
But what (alas) can parliaments avail
When Mary's might must Edward's act repeal?

---

[1] The 1619 version of these lines is a bit clearer: "And she the worthiest reckn'ned is of all, / Whom least the peril seemeth to appal."

[2] <*> Nor of Ket's conquest, which adorns the same.
JOHN, Duke of Northumberland, when before he was Earl of Warwick, in his expedition against Ket, overthrew the rebels of Norfolk and Suffolk, encamped at Mount-Surrey in Norfolk. [Drayton's note.]

[3] white-bear refers to Northumberland; respire breathe on.

[4] <*> Nor of my princely brothers, which might grace.
Gilford Dudley, as remembering in this place the towardness of his brothers, which were all likely indeed to have raised that house of the Dudleys, of which he was a fourth brother, if not suppressed by their father's overthrow. [Drayton's note.]

[5] <*> Nor of Gray's match, my children borne by thee.
Noting in this place the alliance of the Lady Jane Gray by her mother, which was Francis, the daughter of Charles Brandon, by Mary the French Queen, daughter to Henry the seventh, and sister to Henry the eighth. [Drayton's note.]

[6] <*> To bless a sceptre, beautify a throne.
Seldom hath it ever been known of any woman indued with such wonderful gifts, as was this Lady, both for her wisdom and learning: of whose skill in the tongues, one reporteth by this epigram;

Miraris Janam Graio sermone valere?
Quo prinum nata est tempore Graia fuit. [Drayton's note.] Latin, "Are you surprised that Jane Gray can speak Greek? At the time of her birth she was Greek."

[7] bewrays exposes, reveals.

[8] <*> When Dudley led his armies to the east.
The Duke of Northumberland prepared his power at London, for his expedition against the rebels in Norfolk, and making haste away, appointed the rest of his forces to meet him at Newmarket Heath: of whom, this saying is reported: that passing through Shoreditch, the Lord Gray in his company seeing the people in great numbers came to see him, he said: "The people press to see us, but none bid God speed us." [Drayton's note.]

[9] possesst possessed.

[10] <*> That with a counsel's warranty was backed.
John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, when he went out against Queen Mary, had his commission sealed for the generalship of the army, by the consent of the whole counsel of the land: insomuch, that passing through the counsel chamber at his departure, the Earl of Arundel wished that he might have gone with him in that expedition, and to spend his blood in the quarrel. [Drayton's note.]

When Suffolk's power doth Suffolk's hopes withstand,[1]
Northumberland doth leave Northumberland,
And those which should our greatness underprop,
Raze[2] our foundation, overthrow our top.
Ere greatness come, we wish it with our heart,
But being come, we wish it would depart,
And indiscreetly follow that so fast
Which, when it comes, brings peril at the last.
If any man do pity our offence,
Let him be sure to get him far from hence.
Here is no place, no comfort here at all,
For any one that shall bewail our fall,
And we in vain of mercy should but think,
Our briny tears the sullen earth doth drink.
Oh that all tears for us should be forlorn,
And all abortive when they should be born;
Mothers that should their children's fortunes rue,
Fathers in death to kindly bid adieu;
Friends of their friends, a kind farewell to take,
The faithful servant mourning for our sake;
Brothers and sisters waiting on our bier,
Mourners to tell what we were living here.
Those ears are stopped which should bewail our fall,
And we the mourners, and the dead and all;
And that which first our palace was ordained,
The prison which our liberty restrained;
And where our court we held in princely state,
There now alone are left disconsolate.
Thus then resolved, as thou, resolved am I,
Die thou for me, and I for thee will die.
And yet that Heaven Elizabeth may bless,
Be thou (sweet Jane) a faithful prophetess.
With that health gladly resaluting thee,
Which thy kind farewell wished before to me.

—1597

---

[1] <*> When Suffolk's power doth Suffolk's hopes withstand, Northumberland doth leave Northumberland.
The Suffolk men were the first that ever resorted to Queen Mary in her distress, repairing to her succours, whilst she remained both at Keningall, and at Fremingham Castle, still increasing her aides, until the Duke of Northumberland was left forsaken at Cambridge. [Drayton's note.]

[2] Raze rase, tear down.

Robert Southwell
1561-1595

Robert Southwell received a Catholic education abroad, was ordained a Jesuit priest in 1584, and returned to England in 1586 as a missionary priest. He began offering the Sacrament and attempting to create an organization enabling the growth of the Roman Catholic religion and the conversion of England. Catholic priests were considered traitors to the state and monarch, and so Southwell relied on the kindness and secrecy of a number of patrons and followers. One of these patrons, the Countess of Arundel, may have supplied Southwell with a printing press, allowing him to disseminate his poems and prose works to a wider audience than secret sermons could allow. Many of his poems were printed in 1595, though there continued to be a strong circulation of his manuscripts. His poems are therefore part of his larger work as a missionary priest, but his writings carried an aesthetic as well as a religious purpose; he wished to turn fellow poets from secular to sacred subjects, and his conviction that his writings could convert his readers follows traditional humanist beliefs in the importance of education and art. He was captured in 1592, tortured, and left in the Tower for almost three years, after which he was brought to trial, convicted of treason, and hanged, drawn, and quartered. His martyrdom was celebrated in the period, and he was canonized in 1970; his feast day is 21 February.

EDITIONS: St Peters complainte, Mary Magdal[ene's funerall] teares. With other workes of the author R:S. London: Printed by I. Haviland and sold by Robert Allott, 1630. STC 22966; "Decease Release," from The Complete Poems of Robert Southwell, ed. A.B. Grosart. London: Robson and Sons, 1872, pp. 171-72.

The Author to His Loving Cousin[1]

Poets, by abusing their talent and making the follies and feignings of love the customary subject of their base endeavours, have so discredited this faculty, that a poet, a lover, and a liar, are by many reckoned but three words of one signification. But the vanity of men cannot counterpoise the authority of God, who delivering many parts of Scripture in verse, and by his Apostle willing us to exercise our devotion in hymns and spiritual sonnets, warranteth the art to be good, and the use allowable.[2] And therefore not only among the heathen, whose gods were chiefly canonized by their poets, and their paynim[3] divinity oracled in verse, but even in the Old and New Testament it hath been used by men of greatest piety in matters of most devotion. Christ himself, by making a hymn the conclusion of his Last Supper and the prologue to the first pageant of his Passion, gave his spouse a method to imitate, as in the office of the Church it appeareth, and to all men a pattern to know the true use of this measured and footed style. But the Devil, as he affecteth deity and seeketh to have all the complements of divine honour applied to his service, so hath he among the rest possessed also most poets with his idle fancies. For in lieu of solemn and devout matter, to which in duty they owe their abilities, they now busy themselves in expressing such passions as only serve for testimonies to how unworthy affections they have wedded their wills. And because the best course to let them see the error of their works is to weave a new web in their own loom, I have here laid a few coarse threads together, to invite some skillfuller wits to go forward in the same or to begin some finer piece, wherein it may be seen how well verse and virtue suit together. Blame me not (good cousin) though I send you a blame-worthy present, in which the most that can commend it is the good will of the writer, neither art nor invention giving it any credit. If in me this

[1] It is not clear who this "cousin" is; this dedicatory letter opens some editions of Saint Peter's Complaint.

[2] See Ephesians 5:19 and Colossians 3:16; both passages celebrate psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs.

[3] paynim pagan, non-Christian.

be a fault, you cannot be faultless that did importune me to commit it, and therefore you must bear part of the penance, when it shall please sharp censurers to impose it. In the meantime with many good wishes I send you these few ditties, add you the tunes, and let the mean, I pray you, be still a part in all your music.

—1595

from Saint Peter's Complaint

Launch forth my soul into a main[1] of tears,
Full fraught with grief the traffic of thy mind:
Torn sails will serve, thoughts rent with guilty fears:
Give care the stern: use sighs in lieu of wind:
Remorse, the pilot: thy misdeed, the card:[2]
Torment, thy haven: shipwrack, thy best reward.

Shun not the shelf[3] of most deserved shame:
Stick in the sands of agonizing dread:
Content thee to be storm's and billow's game:
Divorc'd from grace thy soul to penance wed:
Fly not from foreign evils, fly from thy heart:
Worse than the worst of evils is that thou art.

Give vent unto the vapours of thy breast,
That thicken in the brims of cloudy eyes:
Where sin was hatched, let tears now wash the nest:
Where life was lost, recover life with cries.
Thy trespass foul: let not thy tears be few:
Baptize thy spotted soul in weeping dew.

Fly mournful plaints, the echoes of my ruth,[4]
Whose screeches in my freighted conscience ring:
Sob out my sorrows, fruits of mine untruth:
Report the smart of sin's infernal sting.

Tell hearts that languish in the sorriest plight,
There is on earth a far more sorry wight.[5]

A sorry wight, the object of disgrace,
The monument of fear, the map of shame,
The mirror of mishap, the stain of place,
The scorn of time, the infamy of fame:
An excrement of earth, to Heaven hateful:
Injurious to man, to God ungrateful.

Ambitious heads, dream you of fortune's pride,
Fill volumes with your forged goddess' praise.
You fancy's drudges, plunge in folly's tide:
Devote your fabling wits to lovers' lays:[6]
Be you, O sharpest griefs, that ever wrung,
Text to my thoughts, theme to my plaining tongue.

[...]

Vain in my vaunts, I vow'd if friends had fail'd,
Alone Christ's hardest fortunes to abide:
Giant, in talk: like dwarf, in trial quail'd:
Excelling none, but in untruth and pride.
Such distance is between high words and deeds:
In proof the greatest vaunter seldom speeds.

[...]

Could servile fear of rendring[7] nature's due,
Which growth in years was shortly like to claim,
So thrall my love, that I should thus eschew
A vowed death and miss so fair an aim?
Die: Die: disloyal wretch thy life detest:
For saving thine, thou hast forsworn the best.

[...]

Ah wretch, why was I nam'd son of a dove,[8]
Whose speeches voided[9] spite and breathed gall?

---

1 main open sea.
2 card chart or map.
3 shelf a sandbank or submerged ledge of rock.
4 ruth sorrow.
5 wight person.
6 lays songs.
7 rendring returning, surrendering.
8 In Matthew 16:17, Peter is called "Simon Barjona" or "son of a dove."
9 voided poured forth, vomited.

No kin I am unto the bird of love:
My stony name[1] much better suits my fall.
My oaths were stones: my cruel tongue the sling:
My God the mark, at which my spite did fling.

Were all the Jewish tyrannies too few,
To glut thy hungry looks with his disgrace,
That thou more hateful tyrannies must shew,[2]
And spit thy poison in thy maker's face?
Didst thou to spare his foes put up thy sword,
To brandish now thy tongue against thy Lord?[3]

Ah tongue, that didst his praise and Godhead sound,
How wert thou stain'd with such detesting words,
That every word was to his heart a wound,
And lanced him deeper than a thousand swords?
What rage of man, yea what infernal sprite,
Could have disgorg'd more loathsome dregs of spite?

Why did the yielding sea like marble way
Support a wretch more wavering than the waves?
Whom doubt did plunge, why did the water stay,[4]
Unkind, in kindness; murthering, while it saves?
Oh that this tongue had then been fishes' food,
And I devour'd before this cursing mood.

[...]

Threats threw me not, torments I none assayed:[5]
My fray,[6] with shades: conceits[7] did make me yield,
Wounding my thoughts with fears: selfly dismayed
I neither fought, nor lost; I gave the field.
Infamous foil:[8] a maiden's easy breath
Did blow me down, and blast my soul to death.

Titles I make untruths: am I a rock?
That with so soft a gale was overthrown?
And I fit pastor for a faithful flock,[9]
To guide their souls that murdred thus mine own?
A rock, of ruin; not a rest, to stay:
A pastor, not to feed: but to betray.

Fidelity was flown when fear was hatched,
Incompatible brood in virtue's nest:
Courage can less with cowardice be matched,
Prowess nor love lodged in divided breast.
O Adam's child cast by a silly Eve,[10]
Heir to thy father's foils, and born to grieve.

In Thabor's[11] joys I eager was to dwell,
An earnest friend while pleasure's light did shine:
But when eclipsed glory prostrate fell,
Those zealous heats to sleep I did resign.
And now my mouth hath thrice his name defil'd,
That cried so loud three dwellings there to build.

When Christ attending the distressful hour
With his surcharged breast did bless the ground,
Prostrate in pangs, raining a bleeding shower,
Me, like myself, a drowsy friend he found.[12]
Thrice in his care sleep closed my careless eye:
Presage, how him my tongue should thrice deny.[13]

[...]

Can virtue, wisdom, strength by woemen[14] spilled
In David's, Solomon's, and Samson's falls,[15]

---

[1] My stony name Matthew 16:18: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I build my church"; Greek, "petros" or stone.

[2] shew show.

[3] Peter's betrayal of Christ is found in Matthew 26, Mark 14, Luke 22, and John 18.

[4] Matthew 14:25-31.

[5] assayed tried or assailed.

[6] fray "fear," or perhaps "assault."

[7] conceits "fanciful notions" or perhaps more generally, "thoughts."

[8] foil defeat, disgrace.

[9] In John 21:1, Jesus tells Peter for the third time, "Feed my sheep."

[10] All people are the children of Adam, overthrown by the fall of Eve and her temptation of Adam.

[11] Thabor a mountain east of Nazareth, thought to be the place of the Transfiguration of Christ into a vision of light, when he is named the son of God, which is alluded to in the next line. See Matthew 17:1-9.

[12] The speaker is drowsy literally and metaphorically or morally.

[13] See Matthew 26:69-75; when women question him, Peter denies his relationship to Jesus three times.

[14] woemen women; this false etymological spelling (1595 edition) emphasizes the woe brought about by deceit of women.

[15] For David, see 2 Samuel 11; for Solomon, see 1 Kings 11; for Samson, see Judges 16.

With semblance of excuse my error guild,
Or lend a marble gloss[1] to muddy walls?
Oh no their fault had show of some pretence.
No veil can hide the shame of my offence.

The blaze of beauty's beams allured their looks:
Their looks, by seeing oft, conceived love:
Love, by affecting,[2] swallowed pleasure's hooks:
Thus beauty, love, and pleasure them did move.
These sirens' sugar'd tunes rock'd them asleep:
Enough to damn, yet not to damn so deep.

But gracious features dazzled not mine eyes,
Two homely droyles[3] were authors of my death:
Not love, but fear, my senses did surprise:
Not fear of force, but fear of woman's breath.[4]
And those unarm'd, ill grac'd, despised, unknown:
So base a blast my truth hath overthrown.

O women, woe to men, traps for their falls,
Still actors in all tragical mischances:
Earth's necessary evils, captiving thralls,[5]
Now murdring with your tongues, now with your glances,
Parents of life, and love: spoilers of both,
The thieves of hearts: false do you love or loath.

In time, O Lord, thine eyes with mine did meet,
In them I read the ruins of my fall:
Their cheering rays that made misfortune sweet,
Into my guilty thoughts pour'd floods of gall.
Their heavenly looks that blest where they beheld,
Darts of disdain, and angry checks did yield.

O sacred eyes, the springs of living light,
The earthly heavens, where angels joy to dwell:
How could you deign to view my deathful plight,
Or let your heavenly beams look on my hell?

But those unspotted eyes encountered mine,
As spotless sun doth on the dunghill shine.

Sweet volumes stored with learning fit for saints,
Where blissful quires[6] imparadise their minds,
Wherein eternal study never faints,
Still finding all, yet seeking all it finds,
How endless is your labyrinth of bliss,
Where to be lost the sweetest finding is?

Ah wretch, how oft have I sweet lessons read,
In those dear eyes, the registers of truth?
How oft have I my hungry wishes fed,
And in their happy joys redress'd my ruth?
Ah that they now are heralds of disdain,
That erst were ever pitiers of my pain.

Yet flames divine that sparkle out your heats
And kindle pleasing fires in mortal hearts:
You nectar'd ambrys[7] of soul-feeding meats,
You graceful quivers of love's dearest darts:
You did vouchsafe to warm, to wound, to feast,
My cold, my stony, my now famished breast.

The matchless eyes, match'd only each by other,
Were pleas'd on my ill-matched eyes to glance:
The eye of liquid pearl, the purest mother,
Broach'd tears in mine to weep for my mischance;
The cabinets of grace unlock'd their treasure,
And did to my misdeeds their mercies measure.

[...]

Christ, health of fevered soul, heaven of the mind,
Force of the feeble, nurse of infant loves,
Guide to the wandring foot, light to the blind,
Whom weeping wins, repentant sorrow moves,
Father in care, mother in tender heart,
Revive and save me slain with sinful dart.

---

1 gloss indicates both a false show and a superficial brilliance.

2 Love, by affecting by bringing about love or desire.

3 droyles drudges, servants.

4 Southwell makes much here of the women's questioning of Peter.

5 Women, like Eve, are in thrall to the Devil while they attempt to captivate men.

6 quires small books, originally of eight leaves.

7 ambrys pantries, treasuries.

If King Manasses[1] sunk in depth of sin,
With plaints and tears recovered grace and crown,
A worthless worm some mild regard may win,
And lowly creep, where flying threw it down.
A poor desire I have to mend my ill:
I should, I would, I dare not say, I will.

I dare not say, I will; but wish, I may:
My pride is checked, high words the speaker spilt:
My good, O Lord, thy gift; thy strength my stay:
Give what thou bidst, and then bid what thou wilt.
Work with[2] me what thou of me dost request:
Then will I dare the most, and vow the best.

Prone look, crossed arms, bent knee, and contrite heart,
Deep sighs, thick sobs, dewed eyes and prostrate prayers,
Most humbly beg release[3] of earned smart,
And saving shroud in mercy's sweet repairs.
If justice should my wrongs with rigour wage:
Fears, would despairs: ruth, breed a hopeless rage.

Lazar[4] at pity's gate I ulcered lie,
Craving the refuse crumbs of children's plate:
My sores, I lay in view to mercy's eye,
My rags, bear witness of my poor estate.
The worms of conscience that within me swarm,
Prove that my plaints are less than is my harm.

With mildness, Jesu, measure my offence:
Let true remorse thy due revenge abate:
Let tears appease when trespass doth incense:
Let pity temper thy deserved hate.
Let grace forgive, let love forget my fall:
With fear I crave, with hope I humbly call.

Redeem my lapse with ransom of thy love,
Traverse[5] th'inditement, rigour's doom suspend:
Let frailty favour, sorrows succour move:
Be thou thy self, though changeling I offend.
Tender my suit, cleanse this defiled den,
Cancel my debts, sweet Jesu, say Amen.

The End of Saint Peter's Complaint.

—1595

From Fortune's Reach

Let fickle fortune run her blindest race:
I settled have an unremoved mind:
I scorn to be the game of fancy's chase,
Or vane to show the change of every wind.
Light giddy humours stinted to no rest,[6]
Still change their choice, yet never choose the best.

My choice was guided by foresightful heed,
It was averred with approving will,
It shall be followed with performing deed,
And seal'd with vow, till death the chooser kill,
Yea death though final date of vain desires,
Ends not my choice, which with no time expires.

To beauty's fading bliss I am no thrall:
I bury not my thoughts in metal mines,
I am not at such fame, as feareth fall,
I seek and find a light that ever shines:
Whose glorious beams display such heavenly sights,
As yield my soul a sum of all delights.

My light to love, my love to life doth guide
To life that lives by love, and loveth light:
By love to one, to whom all loves are tied

[1] Manasses For the story of King Manasseh's idolatry and redemption, see 2 Chronicles 33.

[2] with Some early printed editions have "in" here.

[3] release Some early printed editions have "relief" here.

[4] Lazar For the parable of Lazarus, see Luke 16:19-31.

[5] Traverse act against.

[6] stinted to no rest without a fixed limit.

By dewest[1] debt, and never equalled right.
Eye's light, heart's love, soul's truest life he is,
Consorting in three joys, one perfect bliss.

—1595

Christ's Bloody Sweat[2]

Fat soil, full spring, sweet olive, grape of bliss,
That yields, that streams, that pours, that dost distill,
Untilled, undrawn, unstamped, untouched of press,
Dear fruit, clear brooks, fair oil, sweet wine at will:
Thus Christ unforced prevents in shedding[3] blood
The whips, the thorns, the nails, the spear, and rood.[4]

He pelican's, he phoenix' fate doth prove,[5]
Whom flames consume, whom streams enforce to die,
How burneth blood, how bleedeth burning love?
Can one in flame and stream both bathe and fry?
How could he join a phoenix' fiery pains
In fainting pelican's still bleeding veins?

Elias once to prove God's sovereign power
By prayer procur'd a fire of wondrous force[6]
That blood and wood and water did devour,
Yea stones and dust, beyond all nature's course:
Such fire is love that fed with gory blood
Doth burn no less than in the driest wood.

O sacred fire come show thy force on me
That sacrifice to Christ I may return,
If withered wood for fuel fittest be,
If stones and dust, if flesh and blood will burn,
I withered am and stony to all good,
A sack of dust, a mass of flesh and blood.

—1595

The Prodigal Child's Soul Wrack[7]

Disanchored from a blissful shore,
And launched into the main[8] of cares,
Grown rich in vice, in virtue poor,
From freedom fall'n in fatal snares,

I found myself on every side
Enwrapped in the waves of woe,
And tossed with a toilsome tide
Could to no port for refuge go.

The wrastling winds with raging blasts
Still hold me in a cruel chase.
They broke my anchors, sails, and masts,
Permitting no reposing place.

The boist'rous seas with swelling floods,
On every side did work their spite;
Heaven overcast with stormy clouds,
Denied the planet's guiding light.[9]

The hellish furies lay in wait
To win my soul into their power,
To make me bite at every bait,
Wherein my bane I might devour.

---

[1] dewest most due.

[2] Most early editions of this poem included only the first two stanzas. The last two stanzas were first printed in 1856 by William B. Turnbull in The Poetical Works of the Reverend Robert B. Southwell.

[3] shedding One edition has "sweating" here.

[4] rood the cross on which Christ was crucified, but perhaps also "rod."

[5] The pelican was said to feed its young with the blood from its own pierced breast. The mythical phoenix is one of its kind, a bird that lives for 500-600 years and then burns on a funeral pyre of its own making, only to emerge with renewed strength. Both the pelican and phoenix were traditional and widely-used emblems of Christ.

[6] Elias once to prove … a fire of wondrous force Elijah calls down fire from Heaven in 2 Kings 1:10-14.

[7] In a number of early printed editions, this poem is not divided into stanzas.

[8] main open waters, high seas.

[9] Ships navigated by the light of the North Star.

Thus Heaven and Hell, thus sea and land,
Thus storms and tempests did conspire,
With just revenge of scourging hand
To witness God's deserved ire.[1]

I plunged in this heavy plight
Found in my faults just cause of fears:
By darkness taught to know my light,
The loss thereof enforced tears.

I felt my inward bleeding sores,
My festered wounds began to smart;
Stepped far within death's fatal doors,
The pangs thereof were near my heart.

I cried truce, I craved peace,
A league with death I would conclude,
But vain it was to sue release:
Subdue I must or be subdued.

Death and deceit had pitched their snares
And put their wicked proofs in ure[2]
To sink me in despairing cares,
Or make me stoop to pleasure's lure;

They sought by their bewitching charms
So to enchant my erring sense,
That when they sought my greatest harms,
I might neglect my best defence.

My dazzled eyes could take no view,
No heed of their deceiving shifts,
So often did they alter hue
And practise new devised drifts:

With sirens' songs[3] they fed mine ears,
Till lulled asleep on error's lap,
I found these tunes turned into tears,
And short delights to long mishap.

For I enticed to their lore,
And soothed with their idle toys,
Was trained to their prison door,
The end of all such flying joys:

Where chained in sin I lay in thrall,
Next to the dungeon of despair,
Till mercy raised me from my fall,
And grace my ruins did repair.

—1595

from The Sequence on the Virgin Mary and Christ

vi. The Nativity of Christ

Behold the father is his daughter's son:
The bird that built the nest is hatched therein:
The old of years an hour hath not out run:
Eternal life to live doth now begin.
The word is dumb, the mirth of heaven doth weep:
Might feeble is, and force doth faintly creep.

O dying souls, behold your living spring:
O dazzled eyes, behold your son of grace:
Dull ears, attend what word this word doth bring:
Up heavy hearts, with joy your joy embrace.
From death, from dark, from deafness, from despairs:
This life, this light, this word, this joy repairs.

Gift better than himself, God doth not know:
Gift better than his God, no man can see:
This gift doth here the giver given bestow:
Gift to this gift let each receiver be.
God is my gift, himself he freely gave me:
God's gift am I, and none but God shall have me.

Man altered was by sin from man to beast:
Beast's food is hay, hay is all mortal flesh:
Now God is flesh, and lies in manger pressed:
As hay, the brutest sinner to refresh.

---

[1] God's deserved ire i.e., God's anger is deserved by the speaker.

[2] And put … ure i.e., death and deceit bring their wicked tests to bear.

[3] sirens' song sirens were mythical creatures, part-women, part-bird, who lured sailors to their deaths with enchanting songs.

O happy field wherein this fodder grew,
Whose taste doth us from beasts to men renew.

—1595

The Burning Babe[1]

As I in hoary winter's night
Stood shivering in the snow,
Surpis'd I was with sudden heat,
Which made my heart to glow;

And lifting up a fearful eye,
To view what fire was near,
A pretty babe all burning bright
Did in the air appear;

Who scorched with excessive heat,
Such floods of tears did shed,
As though his floods should quench his flames,
Which with his tears were fed:[2]

Alas (quoth he) but newly born,
In fiery heats I fry,
Yet none approach to warm their hearts,
Or feel my fire, but I;

My faultless breast the furnace is,
The fuel wounding thorns:
Love is the fire, and sighs the smoke,
The ashes, shame and scorns;

The fuel justice layeth on,
And mercy blows the coals,
The metal in this furnace wrought,
Are men's defiled souls:

For which, as now on fire I am
To work them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath,
To wash them in my blood.

With this he vanished out of sight,
And swiftly shrunk away,
And straight I called unto mind,
That it was Christmas day.

—1602

Decease Release
Dum morior orior[3]

The pounded spice both taste and scent doth please,
In fading smoke the force doth incense show,
The perished kernel springeth with increase,
The lopped tree doth best and soonest grow.

God's spice I was and pounding was my due,
In fading breath my incense savoured best,
Death was the mean my kernel to renew,
By lopping shot I up to heavenly rest.

Some things more perfect are in their decay,
Like spark that going out gives clearest light
Such was my hap[4] whose doleful dying day
Began my joy and termed fortune's spite.

Alive a queen, now dead I am a saint,
Once N:[5] called, my name now martyr is,
From earthly reign debarred by restraint,
In lieu whereof I reign in heavenly bliss.

My life my grief, my death hath wrought my joy,
My friends my foil, my foes my weal procur'd,
My speedy death hath shortened long annoy,
And loss of life an endless life assur'd.

---

[1] In the 1630 edition, the poem is printed without stanza divisions.

[2] fed Some early editions have "bred" here.

[3] This poem was inspired by the execution of the Catholic Mary Stuart, queen of Scots in 1587. It was first printed in 1817 by Joseph W. Walter, but the copytext for this anthology is Grossart's 1871 edition; Dum morior orior Latin, "As I die, I rise."

[4] hap happenstance, chance or luck.

[5] "N" stands for nomen or name, which the reader is meant to fill with "Mary."

My scaffold was the bed where ease I found,
The block a pillow of eternal rest,
My headman cast me in a blissful swound,[1]
His axe cut off my cares from cumbered breast.

Rue not my death, rejoice at my repose,
It was no death to me but to my woe,
The bud was opened to let out the rose,
The chains unloos'd to let the captive go.

A prince by birth, a prisoner by mishap,
From crown to cross, from throne to thrall I fell,
My right my ruth, my titles wrought my trap,
My weal my woe, my worldly heaven my hell.

My death from prisoner to a prince enhanc'd,
From cross to crown, from thrall to throne again,
My ruth my right, my trap my style advanc'd,
From woe to weal, from hell to heavenly reign.

—date unknown

[1] swound contains the idea of swoon and wound.

Sir Walter Ralegh (or Raleigh)
1554-1618

Often represented as the epitome of the "Renaissance man," Sir Walter Ralegh was not just a writer, but a courtier, explorer, soldier, member of Parliament, and diplomat. While his first expedition to North America, under the auspices of his half-brother Sir Humphrey Gilbert, came to little, Ralegh seems soon after to have attracted the attention of the Queen's chief favourite, the earl of Leicester, who acquired for him the command of a troop sent to Ireland in 1580 to put down a rebellion. His success, his growing reputation for reckless courage, and his intelligent criticism of England's current policies concerning Ireland brought him in turn to the Queen's attention. Although Ralegh's political career soon brought him a number of important and valuable patronage posts, his explorations and colonizing endeavours occupied him for much of the rest of his life. Taking over from his half-brother Gilbert (lost at sea in 1583), Ralegh undertook a series of expeditions to the New World. Although his attempts to create a permanent colony on Roanoke Island in 1585 and 1587 were tragic failures, Ralegh still managed to transform North American colonization into a major national concern. In 1595—following a period of imprisonment in the Tower for his secret marriage to one of Elizabeth's ladies in waiting, Bess Throckmorton—Ralegh led an expedition to South America, intending to repair his relationship with the Queen by encouraging her to think in terms of wider imperial ambitions. During his expedition to Cadiz in 1596, Ralegh established his military reputation and regained the Queen's favour as he fought the Spanish for the gold of the country. With the death of Elizabeth, however, Ralegh's political and court career came to an end. He spent much of the period between 1603 (when James I came to the throne) and 1618 (when he was executed for treason) in the Tower. While in the Tower, however, he composed one of his most ambitious works, The History of the World; never finished, it was published in 1614.

Ralegh's literary reputation rests on his love poetry and his prose tracts dealing with his expeditions and military accomplishments. An assiduous creator of his own mythology, Ralegh's prose tracts, in particular, present an image of himself as part of a great national and indeed imperial endeavour. "The Last Fight of the Revenge" (1591) and The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana (1596) promote the ideals associated with national and imperial expansion as well as the martial, Protestant character needed to bring them about. The former aims at justifying the English loss of the ship Revenge to the Spaniards, partly through a celebration of the heroism of the Revenge's captain, Sir Richard Grenville (1542-91), which transforms him into a symbol of England's national virtues (for selections, see the additional online texts). Ralegh's political and rhetorical project here—"rewriting of a failure as a success, or the defense of the seemingly indefensible"—is echoed both in his other Elizabethan works and in his Jacobean prison writings. In short, he "attempt[s] to explain away his political (and sexual) betrayal of Queen Elizabeth in the poetry of 1592, ... to justify his lack of gold in his 1596 pamphlet, The Discovery of Guiana, and [to] deny his political betrayal of King James in the series of texts written in the months prior to his execution."[1] Unlike his prose, Ralegh's poems have been haunted by uncertainty concerning their authorship and dating, so much so that the modern editions of his works vary wildly in terms of the number of poems their editors are willing to ascribe to him.[2] The editorial problems are so intractable and complex that Ralegh's most recent critic and editor, Michael Rudick, adopts a radically different approach, offering both those works which are indisputably by Ralegh, as well as "a materially documented Ralegh canon which, although far from authorially sanctioned in whole, represents in historical conspectus what comprised Ralegh's poetic work for sixteenth- and seventeenth-century readers."[3] Many of Ralegh's lyrics exploit the conventional Petrarchan relationship between the poet-lover and his beloved to address his own relationship with the Queen.

---

[1] A. Beer, Sir Walter Ralegh and His Readers in the Seventeenth Century (Houndmills, Basingstoke, 1997), p. 4.

[2] A.C. Latham's 1951 edition assigns 41 poems to Ralegh's hand (with another twelve included under the category "conjectural"), while M. Rudick's 1970 edition assigns 23 poems (with an additional seven "possible" works). See J. Leath Mills, "Sir Walter Ralegh (1554?-29 October 1618)," DLB 172, p. 205.

[3] M. Rudick, ed., The Poems of Sir Walter Ralegh: An Historical Edition (Tempe, AZ, 2000), p. xvi.

Note: For an account of the death of Ralegh's half-brother, the explorer Sir Humphrey Gilbert, as well as an account of Roanoke, see the selections from Richard Hakluyt's Principal Voyages and Navigations (pp. 652-65).

EDITIONS: Excerpts from The Poems of Sir Walter Ralegh: A Historical Edition, edited by Michael Rudick. MRTS Volume 209. Tempe, AZ, 2000. Copyright Arizona Board of Regents for Arizona State University. Reprinted by permission; The discoverie of the large, rich, and bewtiful empire of Guiana. London: [Imprinted] By Robert Robinson, 1596. STC 20634.

Additional Online Texts: Walter Ralegh. From A Report of the Truth of the Fight ... Betwixt the Revenge ... and an Armada of the King of Spain ["The Last Fight of the Revenge"] (1591).

A Vision upon this Conceit of "The Faerie Queene"[1]

Methought I saw the grave, where Laura[2] lay,
Within that temple, where the vestal[3] flame
Was wont to burn, and passing by that way,
To see that buried dust of living fame,
Whose tomb fair Love and fairer Virtue kept,
All suddenly I saw the Faerie Queene;
At whose approach the soul of Petrarch[4] wept,
And from thenceforth those graces were not seen,
For they this Queen attended, in whose steed[5]
Oblivion laid him down on Laura's hearse:
Hereat the hardest stones were seen to bleed,
And groans of buried ghosts the heavens did perse;[6]
Where Homer's spright did tremble all for grief,
And cursed th'access of that celestial thief.

—1590

The Lie[7]

Go, soul, the body's guest,
Upon a thankless arrant;[8]
Fear not to touch[9] the best,
The truth shall be thy warrant.[10]
Go, since I needs must die,
And give the world the lie.[11]

Say to the court, it glows
And shines like rotten wood;
Say to the church, it shows
What's good, and doth no good:
If church and court reply,
Then give them both the lie.

Tell potentates they live
Acting by others' action,
Not loved unless they give,

---

[1] Also known as "Methought I saw the grave, where Laura lay," the poem was included in the prefatory material to the 1590 edition of Spenser's epic romance.

[2] Laura See p. 1111, note 4.

[3] vestal like the eternal flame which burned in the temple of the goddess Vesta, which was attended by virgin priestesses; thus, "pure, sacred."

[4] Petrarch Francesco Petrarca (1304-74), Italian poet and scholar, whose most famous and influential work is the Canzoniere (also known as the Rime or Rime sparse), a collection of lyric verse celebrating the incomparable and idealized Laura.

[5] steed stead.

[6] perse pierce.

[7] "The Lie" circulated anonymously in manuscripts in the 1590s, but it was not attributed to Ralegh in manuscripts until after 1620. It attracted a number of replies, two of which Rudick states "are allusive enough in personal details to make clear their attacks are directed" against Ralegh himself ("Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. xliii). For replies to "The Lie," see Rudick, Poems, pp. 30-45. On the critical disagreement concerning Ralegh's authorship of the poem, see Rudick, Poems, pp. xliii-xlvii.

[8] arrant errand.

[9] touch reprove, rebuke.

[10] warrant fig., a token or evidence of authorization; thus, authorization.

[11] give the world the lie i.e., accuse the world (right to its face) of lying.

Not strong but by affection.
If potentates reply,
Give potentates the lie.

Tell men of high condition[1]
That manage the estate,[2]
Their purpose is ambition,
Their practice only hate.
And if they once reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell them that brave it[3] most,
They beg for more by spending,
Who, in their greatest cost,
Seek nothing but commending.
And if they make reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell zeal it wants[4] devotion;
Tell love it is but lust;
Tell time it metes[5] but motion;
Tell flesh it is but dust.
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth,
Tell honour how it alters,
Tell beauty how she blasteth,[6]
Tell favour how it falters.
And as they shall reply,
Give every one the lie.

Tell wit how much it wrangles
In tickle points of niceness;[7]
Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in over-wiseness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic[8] of her boldness,
Tell skill it is prevention,[9]
Tell charity of coldness,
Tell law it is contention.
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness,[10]
Tell nature of decay,
Tell friendship of unkindness,
Tell justice of delay.
And if they will reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts[11] they have no soundness,
But vary by esteeming;[12]
Tell schools[13] they want profoundness,
And stand too much on seeming.
If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city,
Tell how the country erreth,
Tell manhood shakes off pity,
Tell virtue least preferreth.[14]
And if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

---

1 high condition elevated social position, high rank.
2 estate the state or nation.
3 brave it dress splendidly; make a showy display.
4 wants lacks.
5 metes measures.
6 blasteth withers, shrivels.
7 In tickle points of niceness i.e, in arguments employing delicate points characterized by finicky exactness or subtlety.
8 physic medicine.
9 Tell skill it is prevention i.e., tell understanding that it is merely the faculty which allows one to prudently anticipate and avoid disaster.
10 The goddess Fortuna is traditionally depicted as blindfolded and holding a wheel, respectively emblems of the inscrutable nature of her favour and her perpetual inconstancy.
11 arts i.e., the seven liberal arts, the basis of the Renaissance educational curriculum.
12 by esteeming i.e., according to how they are valued.
13 schools i.e., bodies of knowledge; here, "the four principal philosophical schools of antiquity: the Platonic, Aristotelean (Peripatetic), Stoic, and Epicurean" (Rudick, "Commentary," Poems, p. 152).
14 preferreth advances.

So when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing,
Although to give the lie
Deserves no less than stabbing,
Stab at thee he that will,
No stab thy soul can kill.

—composed, c. 1590/92?; published in Francis Davison's A Poetical Rapsodie (1608)

The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd[1]

If all the world and love were young,
And truth in every shepherd's tongue,
These pretty pleasures might me move
To live with thee and be thy love.

Time drives the flocks from field to fold,
When rivers rage and rocks grow cold,
And Philomel becometh dumb,[2]
The rest complain of cares to come.

The flowers do fade, and wanton fields
To wayward winter reckoning yields;
A honey tongue, a heart of gall,[3]
Is fancy's spring, but sorrow's fall.

Thy gowns, thy shoes, thy beds of roses,
Thy cap, thy kirtle, and thy poesies[4]
Soon break, soon wither, soon forgotten,
In folly ripe, in reason rotten.

Thy belt of straw and ivy buds,
Thy coral clasps and amber studs,
All these in me no means can move
To come to thee and be thy love.

But could youth last and love still breed,[5]
Had joys no date[6] nor age no need,
Then these delights my mind might move
To live with thee and be thy love.

—published in England's Helicon (1600)

Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son[7]

Three things there be that prosper up apace
And flourish, whilst they grow asunder far,
But on a day, they meet all in one place,
And when they meet they one another mar.
And they be these: the wood, the weed, the wag.
The wood is that, which makes the gallow tree;

[1] Rudick includes "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd" among those poems attributed posthumously to Ralegh between approximately 1625 and 1660. Also known as "If all the world and love were young," this poem is one of a number of replies to Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love." The earliest copy of "The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd" appears in Bodleian MS Rawlinson Poetry 148; it is there unattributed. There are two works which ascribe the poem to Ralegh: a marginal note in a copy of England's Helicon (1600) in the John Rylands Library, and one in Izaak Walton's The Compleat Angler (1653). In both England's Helicon and The Compleat Angler, Ralegh's poem follows Marlowe's (Rudick, "Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. lxv).

[2] Tereus, husband of Procne, raped his wife's sister, Philomel; he then cut out her tongue in an attempt to conceal his crime. When Procne finally learned of her sister's violation, she and Philomel killed Tereus and Procne's son, Itys, and served him to Tereus for dinner. When he realized what they had done, he tried to kill them, but the gods transformed them and Tereus into birds (Metamorphosis, 6.423-672).

[3] gall bitterness.

[4] kirtle skirt or outer petticoat; poesies The original spelling here suggests both gifts of posies (small bouquets of flowers) and of poesies (verses or poems).

[5] still breed always be developing or coming into being.

[6] date end.

[7] Rudick includes this poem, sometimes known as "Three things there be," among those attributed posthumously to Ralegh between approximately 1625 and 1660. Although it appears in three post-1625 manuscript verse miscellanies, and, where attributed, it is consistently identified as written by Ralegh for his son, Walter (Wat [1593-1618]), there are no copies of it prior to this approximate date. Given the widespread identification of Wat Ralegh as a rash, if courageous, young man, and given the fact that Ralegh had written an advice manual for Wat (Instructions to his Son, 4 editions, 1632-33), the attribution may be largely wishful thinking, the desire to assign an anonymous poem on the basis of the perceived similarity between its themes, the character of Wat, and the relationship between Ralegh and his son (Rudick, "Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. lxviii-lxix). Copy text: Lathum, p. 49.

The weed is that, which strings the hangman's bag;[1]
The wag,[2] my pretty knave, betokeneth thee.
Mark well, dear boy, whilst these assemble not,
Green springs the tree, hemp grows, the wag is wild;
But when they meet, it makes the timber rot,
It frets the halter,[3] and it chokes the child.
Then bless thee, and beware, and let us pray,
We part not with thee at this meeting day.[4]

—MS. Additional 23229, British Library: circulated, c. 1625-60

from The Ocean to Cynthia[5]
The 21th: and Last Book of the Ocean to Cynthia[6]

Sufficeth it to you, my joys interred,
In simple words that I my woes complain,
You that then died when first my fancy erred,
Joys under dust that never live again.

If to the living were my Muse addressed,
Or did my mind her own spirit still inhold,
Were not my living passion so repressed
As to the dead the dead did these unfold,

Some sweeter words, some more becoming verse,
Should witness my mishap in higher kind;
But my love's wounds, my fancy in the hearse,
The idea but resting of a wasted[7] mind,

The blossoms fallen, the sap gone from the tree,
The broken monuments of my great desires:
From these so lost what may th'affections be?
What heat in cinders of extinguished fires?

Lost in the mud of those high-flowing streams,
Which through more fairer fields their courses bend,
Slain with self-thoughts, amazed in fearful dreams,
Woes without date,[8] discomforts without end,

From fruitful trees I gather withered leaves,
And glean the broken ears with miser's hands;
Who sometime did enjoy the weighty sheaves,
I seek fair flowers amid the brinish sand.

[...]

---

[1] hangman's bag perhaps, the bag that the hangman placed over the condemned person's head just prior to execution.

[2] wag a mischievous boy (a term of affection).

[3] frets the halter i.e., causes the hangman's noose to rub and chafe (thus, to tighten).

[4] "God bless the child" replaces "Then bless thee ... at this meeting day" in the other three manuscript versions of this poem (in Harvard Eng 686; Bodleian Malone 19; and Folger V.a.162). See Rudick, "Commentary," Poems, p. 125.

[5] The "Cynthia" poems (which comprise in Rudick's edition five poems) exist in Ralegh's autograph; four of the "Cynthia" poems were discovered in the mid-nineteenth century. Critics believe that the poems were spurred by Elizabeth's imprisonment of Ralegh and his new wife Elizabeth Throckmorton; they had married without the queen's knowledge or consent (Rudick, "Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. xlviii). Although in Book III of The Faerie Queene and in a sonnet appended to its 1590 edition Spenser refers to a poem of Ralegh addressed to Elizabeth as Cynthia, Rudick cautions against identifying these references as alluding to the "Cynthia" poems. Although Spenser refers again to what seem to be Ralegh's "Cynthia" poems in "Colin Clout's Come Home Againe," Rudick and other critics have viewed with skepticism attempts to reconstruct Ralegh's poem by any of the references in Spenser's works (xlix-l). How the "Cynthia" poems ended up among the Cecil family papers is a matter of some speculation, although Ralegh may have asked Cecil to deliver them to the queen (ibid., p. li).

[6] There is much disagreement among critics about the actual numbering of this the longest of the "Cynthia" poems, with Latham reading the poem's subtitle as "The 11th: and last booke of the Ocean to Scinthia." Rudick, however, supports S. Clanton's argument that Ralegh's subtitle here should be read as "The 21th [the one and twentieth] and [then the] last [i.e., the 22nd] booke of the Ocean to Scinthia." D. and M. Brooks-Davies argue that the number in the subtitle is actually in italic (i.e., "vith") and thus the subtitle refers to the fragment as the "sixth book." The attractiveness of the latter proposal lies in the "thematic appropriateness of a 'sixth book' on the basis of a Vergilian echo: like Aeneid 6, this poem is a descensus ad inferos (i.e., a descent into the underworld) wherein Ralegh as Aeneas confronts his betrayal of Queen Elizabeth as Dido" (Rudick, "Commentary," Poems, p. 159). Cynthia was one of the many names under which Elizabeth was represented in sixteenth-century verse. Cynthia was another name for Diana or Artemis, the huntress, the goddess of the moon, chastity, and virginity. While Rudick has left spelling and punctuation as in the original manuscript, we have modernized spelling and punctuation, and have divided the verse paragraphs up into their constituent quatrains for ease of reading.

[7] resting remaining; wasted devastated.

[8] date end, termination.

O hopeful love, my object and invention,
O true desire, the spur of my conceit,[1]
O worthiest spirit, my mind's impulsion,[2]
O eyes transpersant,[3] my affection's bait,

O princely form, my fancy's adamant,[4]
Divine conceit, my pain's acceptance,
O all in one, O Heaven on earth transparent,
The seat of joys, and love's abundance!

Out of that mass of miracles my Muse
Gathered those flowers, to her pure senses pleasing;
Out of her eyes (the store of joys) did choose
Equal delights, my sorrows counterpeising.[5]

Her regal looks my rigorous sighs suppressed;
Small drops of joys sweetened great worlds of woes;
One gladsome day a thousand cares redressed.
Whom Love defends, what fortune overthrows?

When she did well, what did there else amiss?
When she did ill, what empires could have pleased?
No other power effecting woe or bliss,
She gave, she took, she wounded, she appeased.

The honour of her love, love still devising,
Wounding my mind with contrary conceit,
Transferred itself sometime to her aspiring,
Sometime the trumpet of her thought's retreat.

To seek new worlds for gold, for praise, for glory,
To try[6] desire, to try love severed far,
When I was gone, she sent her memory,
More strong than were ten thousand ships of war,

To call me back, to leave great honour's thought,
To leave my friends, my fortune, my attempt,
To leave the purpose I so long had sought,
And hold both cares and comforts in contempt.

Such heat in ice, such fire in frost remained,
Such trust in doubt, such comfort in despair,
Much like the gentle lamb, though lately weaned,
Plays with the dug,[7] though finds no comfort there.

But as a body, violently slain,
Retaineth warmth although the spirit be gone,
And by a power in nature moves again,
Till it be laid below the fatal stone;

Or as the earth, even in cold winter days,
Left for a time by her life-giving sun,
Doth by the power remaining of his rays
Produce some green, though not as it hath done;

Or as a wheel forced by the falling stream,
Although the course be turned some other way,
Doth for a time go round upon the beam,
Till, wanting strength to move, it stands at stay;

So my forsaken heart, my withered mind,
Widow of all the joys it once possessed,
My hopes clean out of sight, with forced wind
To kingdoms strange, to lands far-off, addressed,

Alone, forsaken, friendless, on the shore,
With many wounds, with death's cold pangs embraced,

---

1 conceit invention.
2 impulsion impulse, incitement.
3 transpersant transparent.
4 adamant i.e., loadstone or magnet.
5 counterpoising counterpoising, counterbalancing, counter-weighing.
6 try test.
7 dug teat.

Writes in the dust, as one that could no more,
Whom love, and time, and fortune, had defaced,

Of things so great, so long, so manifold,
With means so weak, the soul even then departing,
The weal,[1] the woe, the passages of old,
And worlds of thoughts described by one last sighing;

[...]

My weary limbs her memory embalmed;
My darkest ways her eyes make clear as day.
What storms so great but Cynthia's beams appeased?
What rage so fierce, that love could not allay?

Twelve years entire I wasted in this war,[2]
Twelve years of my most happy younger days;
But I in them, and they now wasted are,
Of all which past the sorrow only stays.

[...]

Therefore, all lifeless and all helpless bound,
My fainting spirits sunk, and heart appaled,
My joys and hopes lay bleeding on the ground,
That not long since the highest heaven scaled.

I hated life and cursed destiny;
The thoughts of passed times, like flames of hell,
Kindled afresh within my memory
The many dear achievements that befell

In those prime years and infancy of love,
Which to describe were but to die in writing;
Ah, those I sought, but vainly, to remove,
And vainly shall, by which I perish living.

And though strong reason hold before mine eyes
The images and forms of worlds past,
Teaching the cause why all those flames that rise
From forms external can no longer last

Than that those seeming beauties hold in prime[3]
Love's ground, his essence, and his empery,
All slaves to age, and vassals unto time,
Of which repentance writes the tragedy.[4]

But this my heart's desire could not conceive,[5]
Whose love outflew the fastest flying time,
A beauty that can easily deceive
Th'arrest of years, and creeping age outclimb,

A spring of beauties which time ripeth not,
Time that but works on frail mortality,
A sweetness which woe's wrongs outwipeth not,
Whom love hath chose for his divinity,

A vestal[6] fire that burns but never wasteth,
That loseth nought by giving light to all,
That endless shines each-where[7] and endless lasteth,
Blossoms of pride that can nor vade[8] nor fall.

These were those marvellous perfections,
The parents of my sorrow and my envy,
Most deathful and most violent infections,
These be the tyrants that in fetters tie

Their wounded vassals, yet nor kill nor cure,
But glory in their lasting misery,

---

1 weal happiness.

2 Twelve years entire I wasted in this war between the commencement of Ralegh's Irish military service (1580) and his fall from favour and imprisonment (1592). See Rudick, "Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. li.

3 in prime primarily, in the first place.

4 Teaching the cause ... tragedy the well-known Platonic notion that a man who grounds his love for a physical object in its physical attractiveness will find his love waning with the inevitable passing of such beauty.

5 conceive understand, apprehend.

6 vestal pure.

7 each-where everywhere.

8 vade fade, decay, perish.

That as her beauties would our woes should dure;[1]
These be the effects of powerful empery.

Yet have these wonders want, which want[2] compassion;
Yet hath her mind some marks of human race;
Yet will she be a woman for a fashion,
So doth she please her virtues to deface.

And like as that immortal power doth seat[3]
An element of waters to allay
The fiery sunbeams that on earth do beat,
And temper by cold night the heat of day,

So hath perfection, which begat her mind,
Added thereto a change of fantasy,[4]
And left her the affections of her kind,
Yet free from every evil but cruelty.

But leave her praise; speak thou of nought but woe;
Write on the tale that sorrow bids thee tell;
Strive to forget, and care no more to know
Thy cares are known, by knowing those too well.

Describe her now as she appears to thee,
Not as she did appear in days fordone;[5]
In love those things that were no more may be,
For fancy[6] seldom ends where it begun.

And as a stream by strong hand bounded in
From nature's course where it did sometime run,
By some small rent or loose part doth begin
To find escape, till it a way hath won,

Doth then all unawares in sunder tear
The forced bounds, and raging run at large
In th'ancient channels as they wonted[7] were;
Such is of women's love the careful charge,[8]

Held and maintained with multitude of woes;
Of long erections such the sudden fall,
One hour diverts, one instant overthrows,
For which our lives, for which our fortunes, thrall.[9]

[...]

But I, unblessed and ill born creature,
That did embrace the dust her body bearing,
That loved her both by fancy[10] and by nature,
That drew, even with the milk in my first sucking,

Affection from the parent's breast that bare me,
Have found her as a stranger so severe,
Improving my mishap[11] in each degree.
But love was gone; so would I my life were!

A queen she was to me, no more Belphebe,[12]
A lion then, no more a milk-white dove;
A prisoner in her breast I could not be;
She did untie the gentle chains of love.

Love was no more the love of hiding
All trespass and mischance for her own glory.

---

1 dure continue, last.

2 want something lacking, a deficiency; which want which lack.

3 immortal power God; seat establish.

4 change of fantasy unclear; perhaps, "caprice, changeful mood," or "inclination, liking, desire," or perhaps simply "the capacity to imagine."

5 fordone completely finished; completely in the past.

6 fancy love.

7 wonted accustomed.

8 careful charge responsibility full of care; wearisome burden or responsibility.

9 in the MS: "For which our lives, for which our fortunes thrale": thus, perhaps, "[that] for which our lives and fortunes are enthralled or enslaved." See Rudick, "Commentary," Poems, p. 162 for different readings of this line.

10 fancy inclination.

11 Improving magnifying, intensifying; mishap bad luck, misfortune.

12 Belphebe a variation on Phoebe, another name for Cynthia (see p. 1114, note 6). Belphoebe is also the name of the virginal huntress in Book III of Spenser's Faerie Queene, yet another version of Elizabeth I.

It had been such; it was still for th'elect;[1]
But I must be th'example in love's story;
This was of all forepast the sad effect.

But thou, my weary soul and heavy thought,
Made by her love a burden to my being,
Dost know my error never was forethought,[2]
Or ever could proceed from sense of loving.

Of other cause if then it had proceeding,
I leave th'excuse, sith[3] judgement hath been given;
The limbs divided, sundered, and a-bleeding
Cannot complain the sentence was uneven.[4]

This did that nature's wonder, virtue's choice,
The only paragon of time's begetting,
Divine in words, angelical in voice,
That spring of joys, that flower of love's own setting,

Th'Idea remaining of those golden ages,[5]
That beauty braving heavens, and earth embalming,
Which after worthless worlds but play on stages;
Such didst thou her long since describe, yet sighing

That thy unable spirit could not find aught
In heaven's beauties or in earth's delight
For likeness fit to satisfy thy thought.
But what hath it availed thee so to write?

She cares not for thy praise, who knows not theirs;
It's now an idle labour, and a tale
Told out of time that dulls the hearer's ears,
A merchandise whereof there is no sale.

Leave them, or lay them up with thy despairs.
She hath resolved, and judged thee long ago.
Thy lines are now a murmuring to her ears,
Like to a falling stream, which passing slow

Is wont to nourish sleep and quietness.
So shall thy painful labours be perused,
And draw on rest, which sometime had regard;[6]
But those her cares thy errors have excused;

Thy days fordone have had their day's reward.
So her hard heart, so her estranged mind,
In which above the heavens I once reposed,
So to thy error have her ears inclined,

And have forgotten all thy past deserving,
Holding in mind but only thine offence,
And only now affecteth thy depraving,[7]
And thinks all vain that pleadeth thy defence.

[...]

She is gone, she is lost! She is found, she is ever fair!
Sorrow draws weakly where love draws not too;
Woe's cries sound nothing, but only in love's ear;
Do then by dying what life cannot do.

Unfold thy flocks and leave them to the fields,
To feed on hills, or dales, where likes them best,
Of what the summer or the springtime yields,
For love, and time, hath given thee leave to rest.

---

[1] elect i.e., those specially chosen or picked out (the word has strong religious overtones; "the elect" was that group of people chosen by God for salvation).

[2] forethought premeditated.

[3] sith since, seeing that.

[4] uneven unfair, unjust.

[5] Th'Idea ... golden ages a reference to the Platonic definition of "idea": Elizabeth is the general or ideal form, type, or model of the perfection characteristic of the golden age, when humanity lived in harmony with nature and when time, death, and change were unknown. Ralegh's plural form may be occasioned by the fact that there was a classical and a Christian conception of the golden age. See I. Rivers, "The Golden Age and the Garden of Eden," Classical and Christian Ideas in English Renaissance Poetry, 2nd ed. (London, 1996), pp. 9-19.

[6] draw on rest, which sometime had regard i.e., make her fall asleep, which at one time would have made her pay observant attention (and, thus, give due attention and respect to).

[7] only now affecteth thy depraving i.e., is now only fond of (hearing about) thy vilification, disparagement, or representation as vile or bad.

Thy heart which was their fold, now in decay,
By often storms and winter's many blasts
All torn and rent, becomes misfortune's prey;
False hope, my shepherd's staff, now age hath brast.[1]

My pipe, which love's own hand gave my desire
To sing her praises and my woe upon,
Despair hath often threatened to the fire,
As vain to keep now all the rest are gone.

Thus home I draw, as death's long night draws on;
Yet every foot old thoughts turn back mine eyes.
Constraint me guides, as old age draws a stone
Against the hill, which over-weighty lies

For feeble arms or wasted strength to move;
My steps are backward, gazing on my loss,
My mind's affection and my soul's sole love,
Not mixed with fancy's chaff or fortune's dross.

To God I leave it, who first gave it me,
And I her gave, and she returned again,
As it was hers; so let his mercies be
Of my last comforts the essential mean.[2]

But be it so or not, th'effects are past;
Her love hath end; my woe must ever last.

—Cecil Papers 144, Hatfield House: composed, 1582-83; first published, 1870

[1] brast burst.

[2] mean means.

Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk[3]

Nature that washed her hands in milk
And had forgot to dry them,
Instead of earth took snow and silk
At Love's request to try[4] them,
If she a mistress could compose
To please Love's fancy out of those.

Her eyes he would should be of light,
A violet breath, and lips of jelly;
Her hair not black, nor over-bright,
And of the softest down her belly;
As for her inside, he'ld[5] have it
Only of wantonness and wit.

At Love's entreaty such a one
Nature made, but with her beauty
She hath framed a heart of stone;
So as Love by ill destiny
Must die for her whom Nature gave him,
Because her darling would not save him.

[3] Rudick includes this poem among those attributed posthumously to Ralegh between approximately 1625 and 1660. He notes that the poem's provenance is particularly complex, since there are two versions of it: "The last six lines of 'Nature that washed' served, with a couplet added, as Ralegh's valediction in 1618 [i.e., the poem which he is said to have written just before his death]; [however], no copy of the preceding stanzas [of "Nature that washed"] is extant before the second quarter of the seventeenth century, when two versions were in circulation: one of eighteen verses [i.e., lines], all of whose copies are anonymous [...], and one of thirty-six verses, three of whose four known copies are attributed to Ralegh" (Rudick, "Attributions, Arrangement, Chronology," Poems, p. lxiii). Two of the attributed copies are titled "'S.W.R. to his Mistress Serena' and add the valedictory couplet to the last stanza, with a marginal note: 'This last staf was said to be made by Sir Walter Raleigh a little before his death, with the addition of those two last verses.'" On the basis of these copies, then, it would appear that "the poem was written before 1618 [many would say before 1603], by Ralegh, and his valediction was, like his petitions to Queen Anne, a resurrection of his own previously written verse." However, there are also a number of factors that tend to cast doubt on Ralegh's authorship: "no trace of ascription to Ralegh before 1625 (... no trace of the poem, in either form, before then); ascription to Ralegh only in verse miscellanies ...; and an available explanation of the ascription through connection with some features of Ralegh's posthumous reputation (in this case, the verses shared with the valediction)" (p. lxiv).

[4] try test.

[5] he'ld he would.

But Time—which Nature doth despise,
And rudely gives her love the lie,[1]
Makes hope a fool, and sorrow wise—
His hands doth neither wash nor dry,
But being made of steel and rust,
Turns snow, and silk, and milk to dust.

The light, the belly, lips and breath,
He dims, discolours, and destroys;
With those he feeds, but fills not Death,
Which sometimes were the food of joys.
Yea, Time doth dull each lively wit,
And dries all wantonness with it.

O cruel Time which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust,
Who in the dark and silent grave
When we have wandered all our ways
Shuts up the story of our days.

—MS. Harley 6917, British Library: composed, c. 1603-18?; circulated c. 1625-60

[1] gives her love the lie i.e., accuses her love right to her face of lying. In Rudick, "discovers" (p. 114).

[from The Discovery of Guiana]

from The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana[2]

To the Right Honourable My Singular Good Lord and Kinsman, Charles Howard,[3] Knight of the Garter, Baron, and Councillor, and of the Admirals of England the Most Renowned: And to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Cecil,[4] Knight, Councillor in Her Highness' Privy Councils.

For your Honours' many honourable and friendly

[2] Guiana This territory represents roughly the equivalent of modern-day Venezuela; for Ralegh, it was a region on the NE coast of South America, between the rivers Orinoco and Amazon. For invaluable maps which show the native polities, peoples, and locations mentioned in the Discovery, see N.L. Whitehead's excellent edition, The Discoverie of the Large, Rich and Bewtiful Empyre of Guiana by Sir Walter Ralegh (Manchester, 1997), especially p. 61. The title page continues: "With a Relation of the Great and Golden City of Manoa (which the Spaniards call El Dorado) and the Provinces of Emeria, Arromaia, Amapaia, and Other Countries, with Their Rivers, Adjoining. Performed in the Year 1595, by Sir W. Ralegh, Knight, Captain of Her Majesty's Guard, Lo[rd] Warden of the Sanneries, and her Highness' Lieutenant-General of the County of Cornwall."

[3] Charles Howard (1536-1624), earl of Nottingham (the title being a reward for his leadership in the raid against Spanish Cadiz in 1596), and lord high admiral (1585-1618), who in 1588 led his forces to victory against the Spanish Armada. Although he and Ralegh had served together at sea and had been comrades-in-arms, Howard had not hesitated to take over the family's valuable wine monopolies when Ralegh began his long imprisonment in the Tower (R. Lacey, Sir Walter Ralegh [London, 1973], pp. 316-17), even dunning the family for arrears in payment (M. Irwin, That Great Lucifer: A Portrait of Sir Walter Ralegh [Harmondsworth, 1962], p. 211).

[4] Sir Robert Cecil (?1563-1612), son of William Cecil, Lord Burghley, Robert Cecil was later first earl of Salisbury and first viscount Cranborne; he was a member of Elizabeth's Privy Council and secretary of state for both Elizabeth and James I. Although Cecil and Ralegh were at one point allies at Elizabeth's court in opposition to the influential faction of the earl of Essex, later Cecil prevented Ralegh from gaining a peerage and a seat on Elizabeth's Privy Council, planning behind the scenes to undermine Ralegh with the future James I in an attempt to bolster his own position on the death of the Queen (R. Trevelyan, Sir Walter Raleigh [New York, 2002], pp. 349-52). However, Cecil was also instrumental in saving Ralegh's life, by arranging for his death sentence to be commuted to imprisonment in the Tower (for thirteen years), and in rescuing Ralegh's property for his wife and son (M. Irwin, That Great Lucifer, pp. 211-12).

parts[1] I have hitherto only returned promises, and now for answer of both your adventures[2] I have sent you a bundle of papers, which I have divided between your lordship and Sir Robert Cecil in these two respects chiefly: first, for that it is reason that wasteful factors[3] when they have consumed such stocks as they had in trust do yield some colour for the same in their account;[4] secondly, for that I am assured that whatsoever shall be done or written by me shall need a double protection and defence. The trial that I had of both your loves, when I was left of all but of malice and revenge,[5] makes me still presume that you will be pleased (knowing what little power I had to perform ought, and the great advantage of forewarned enemies) to answer that out of knowledge which others shall but object out of malice. In my more happy times as I did especially honour you both, so I found that your loves sought me out in the darkest shadow of adversity, and that the same affection which accompanied my better fortune soared not away from me in my many miseries. All which, though I cannot requite, yet I shall ever acknowledge; and the great debt which I have no power to pay, I can do no more for a time but confess to be due. It is true that as my errors were great so they have yielded very grievous effects, and if ought might have been deserved in former times to have counterpoised any part of offences, the fruit thereof (as it seemeth) was long before fallen from the tree, and the dead stalk only remained. I did, therefore, even in the winter of my life, undertake these travels—fitter for bodies less blasted with misfortunes, for men of greater ability, and for minds of better encouragement—that thereby (if it were possible) I might recover but the moderation of excess,[6] and the least taste of the greatest plenty formerly possessed. If I had known other way to win, if I had imagined how greater adventures might have regained, if I could conceive what farther means I might yet use but even to appease so powerful a displeasure, I would not doubt but for one year more to hold fast my soul in my teeth[7] till it were performed. Of that little remain[8] I had, I have wasted in effect all herein; I have undergone many constructions;[9] I have been accompanied with many sorrows, with labour, hunger, heat, sickness, and peril. It appeareth notwithstanding that I made no other bravado[10] of going to the sea than was meant, and that I was neither hidden in Cornwall or elsewhere, as was supposed. They have grossly belied me that forejudged that I would rather become a servant to the Spanish king than return, and the rest were much mistaken, who would have persuaded that I was too easeful[11] and sensual to undertake a journey of so great travail.[12] But if what I have done receive the gracious construction of a painful pilgrimage, and purchase the least remission,[13] I shall think all too little, and that there were wanting[14] to the rest many miseries. But if both the times past, the present, and what may be in the future do all by one grain of gall continue in an eternal distaste, I do not then know whether I should bewail myself either for my too much travel and expense, or condemn myself for doing less than that, which can deserve nothing. From myself I have deserved no thanks, for I am returned a beggar and withered. But that I might have bettered my poor estate, it shall appear by the

[1] parts acts, favours.

[2] for answer of both your adventures i.e., in response to the risks you have taken (for me).

[3] factors agents, middle-men.

[4] do yield some colour for the same in their account i.e., come up with some way of concealing or at least favourably representing this waste in their official account.

[5] The trial … revenge Both Cecil and Howard invested in Ralegh's Guiana expedition, with Howard even providing one of Ralegh's ships, the Lion's Whelp (R. Trevelyan, Sir Walter Raleigh, p. 216). Cecil also seems to have actively promoted Ralegh's achievements to the Queen when Ralegh returned from Guiana (pp. 251-52).

[6] excess abundance.

[7] hold fast my soul in my teeth i.e., hang tenaciously and determinedly onto life.

[8] remain remnant.

[9] constructions explanations, interpretations.

[10] bravado ostentatious display of courage or boldness.

[11] easeful slothful, lazy.

[12] travail labour, hardship, suffering.

[13] pilgrimage … remission Religious pilgrimage was sometimes undertaken as a penance, in order to gain forgiveness ("remission") for sins.

[14] wanting lacking, absent from.

following discourse, if I had not only respected her Majesty's future honour and riches. It became not the former fortune in which I once lived to go journeys of picory,[1] and it had sorted ill with the offices of honour, which by her Majesty's grace I hold this day in England, to run from cape to cape, and from place to place, for the pillage of ordinary prizes.

[...]

The country hath more quantity of gold by manifold[2] than the best parts of the Indies or Peru. All the most of the kings of the borders are already become her Majesty's vassals,[3] and seem to desire nothing more than her Majesty's protection and the return of the English nation. It hath another ground and assurance of riches and glory than the voyages of the West Indies, and an easier way to invade the best parts thereof than by the common course. The King of Spain is not so impoverished by taking three or four port towns in America as we suppose; neither are the riches of Peru or Nueva Espania[4] so left by the seaside, as it can be easily washed away with a great flood or spring tide, or left dry upon the sands on a low ebb. The port towns are few and poor in respect of the rest within the land, and are of little defence, and are only rich when the fleets are to receive the treasure for Spain. And we might think the Spaniards very simple, having so many horses and slaves, that if they could not upon two days' warning carry all the gold they have into the land, and far enough from the reach of our footmen, especially the Indies being (as it is for the most part) so mountainous, so full of woods, rivers, and marshes. [...] But I hope it shall appear that there is a way found to answer every man's longing, a better Indies for her Majesty than the King of Spain hath any, which if it shall please her Highness to undertake, I shall most willingly end the rest of my days in following the same. If it be left to the spoil and sackage[5] of common persons, if the love and service of so many nations be despised, so great riches, and so mighty an empire refused, I hope her Majesty will yet take my humble desire and my labour therein in gracious part, which if it had not been in respect of her Highness' future honour and riches, I could have laid hands and ransomed many of the kings and cassiqui[6] of the country, and have had a reasonable proportion of gold for their redemption. But I have chosen rather to bear the burden of poverty than reproach, and rather to endure a second travel and the chances thereof than to have defaced an enterprise of so great assurance, until I knew whether it pleased God to put a disposition in her princely and royal heart either to follow or foreslow[7] the same. I will, therefore, leave it to his ordinance that hath only power in all things, and do humbly pray that your Honours will excuse such errors as, without the defence of art, overrun in every part the following discourse, in which I have neither studied phrase, form, nor fashion; and that you will be pleased to esteem me as your own (though over-dearly bought) and I shall ever remain ready to do you all honour and service.

W.R.

To the Reader

Because there have been divers[8] opinions conceived of the gold ore brought from Guiana, and for that an alderman of London and an officer of her Majesty's Mint hath given out that the same is of no price,[9] I have thought good by the addition of these lines to give answer as well to the said malicious slander as to other objections. It is

[1] picory looting, plundering, marauding.

[2] by manifold many times over.

[3] vassals technically, those who hold lands from a superior and who owe their overlord loyalty and allegiance in return.

[4] Nueva Espania New Spain, comprising all of present-day Mexico and Central America, down to the southern border of Costa Rica and portions of the United States (California, Arizona, New Mexico, and Texas). See Handbook of Texas Online, U of Texas, <http://www.thsaonline.org>.

[5] spoil and sackage pillaging and plundering.

[6] cassiqui lords or chiefs (from a native Haitian word, cacique).

[7] foreslow put off, pursue in a slow or dilatory fashion.

[8] divers many, varied.

[9] price value.

true that while we abode at the island of Trinidad, I was informed by an Indian that not far from the port where we anchored there were found certain mineral stones, which they esteemed to be gold, and were thereunto persuaded the rather for that they had seen both English and French men gather and embark[1] some quantities thereof. Upon this likelihood, I sent forty men and gave order that each one should bring a stone of that mine to make trial of the goodness;[2] which being performed, I assured them at their return that the same was marcasite,[3] and of no riches or value. Notwithstanding, divers, trusting more to their own sense than to my opinion, kept of the said marcasite, and have tried[4] thereof, since my return, in divers places. In Guiana itself I never saw marcasite, but all the rocks, mountains, all stones in the plains, in woods, and by the rivers' sides are in effect thorow[5] shining, and appear marvellous rich, which being tried to be no marcasite, are the true signs of rich minerals, but are no other than El madre del oro (as the Spaniards term them) which is "the mother of gold," or as it is said by others, "the scum of gold." Of divers sorts of these many of my company brought also into England, everyone taking the fairest for the best, which is not general. For mine own part, I did not countermand any man's desire or opinion, and I could have afforded them little, if I should have denied them the pleasing of their own fancies therein. But I was resolved that gold must be found either in grains separate from the stone (as it is in most of all the rivers in Guiana) or else in a kind of hard stone, which we call the white spar, of which I saw divers hills, and in sundry places, but had neither time, nor men, nor instruments fit to labour. Near unto one of the rivers I found of the said white spar or flint a very great ledge or bank, which I endeavoured to break by all the means I could, because there appeared on the outside some small grains of gold; but finding no mean to work the same upon the upper part, seeking the sides and circuit of the said rock, I found a clift[6] in the same, from whence with daggers and with the head of an ax we got out some small quantity thereof, of which kind of white stone (wherein gold is engendered) we saw divers hills and rocks in every part of Guiana wherein we travelled. Of this there hath been made many trials, and in London it was first assayed[7] by Master Westwood, a refiner dwelling in Wood street, and it held after the rate of 12,000 or 13,000 pounds a ton. Another sort was afterward tried by Master Bulmar and Master Dimoke, assay-master,[8] and it held after the rate of 23,000 pounds a ton. There was some of it again tried by Master Palmer, comptroller of the Mint,[9] and Master Dimoke in Goldsmiths' Hall, and it held after 26,900 pounds a ton. There was also at the same time, and by the same persons, a trial made of the dust of the said mine which held 8 pounds, 6 ounces weight of gold in the hundred. There was likewise, at the same time, a trial made of an image of copper made in Guiana, which held a third part gold, besides divers trials made in the country, and by others in London. But because there came of ill with the good, and belike the said alderman was not presented with the best, it hath pleased him therefore to scandal all the rest, and to deface the enterprise as much as in him lieth. It hath also been concluded by divers that if there had been any such ore in Guiana, and the same discovered,

---

1 embark put on board [their] ships.

2 to make trial of the goodness i.e., to test whether or not it were genuine.

3 marcasite pyrites of copper and iron, which had the lustre of gold and silver and were thus wrongly supposed to contain these precious ores; sometimes called "fool's gold."

4 tried tested.

5 thorow throughout, completely, right through.

6 clift crevice.

7 assayed tested its composition in order to determine the exact amount of gold in the ore.

8 assay-master master of an assay-house; an officer appointed to assay coin, gold, and silver plate.

9 Master Palmer, comptroller of the Mint Dr. Andrew Palmer was the comptroller or controller of the Royal Mint before 1581; later, he was city chamberlain. See J. Craig, The Mint: A History of the London Mint from A.D. 287 to 1948 (Cambridge, 1953), p. 124.

that I would have brought home a greater quantity thereof. First, I was not bound to satisfy any man of the quantity, but such only as adventured,[1] if any store had been returned thereof. But it is very true that, had all their mountains been of massy gold, it was impossible for us to have made any longer stay to have wrought[2] the same; and whosoever hath seen with what strength of stone the best gold ore is environed, he will not think it easy to be had out in heaps, and especially by us who had neither men, instruments, nor time (as it is said before) to perform the same. There were on this discovery no less than one hundred persons, who can all witness that when we passed any branch of the river to view the land within, and stayed from our boats but six hours, we were driven to wade to the eyes at our return; and if we attempted the same the day following, it was impossible either to ford it or to swim it, both by reason of the swiftness and also for that the borders[3] were so pestered with fast[4] woods, as neither boat nor man could find place either to land or to embark; for in June, July, August, and September, it is impossible to navigate any of those rivers, for such is the fury of the current, and there are so many trees and woods overflown, as if any boat but touch upon any tree or stake, it is impossible to save any one person therein;[5] and ere[6] we departed the land, it ran with that swiftness as we drove down most commonly against the wind little less than one hundred miles a day; besides, our vessels were no other than wherries, one little barge, a small cockboat, and a bad galiota,[7] which we framed in haste for that purpose at Trinidad, and those little boats had nine or ten men apiece, with all their victuals and arms. It is further true that we were about 400 miles from our ships, and had been a month from them, which also we left weakly-manned in an open road,[8] and had promised our return in fifteen days.

Others have devised that the same ore was had from Barbary,[9] and that we carried it with us into Guiana. Surely, the singularity of that device I do not well comprehend. For mine own part, I am not so much in love with these long voyages as to devise thereby to cozen[10] myself, to lie hard, to fare worse,[11] to be subjected to perils, to diseases, to ill savours,[12] to be parched and withered, and withal to sustain the care and labour of such an enterprise, except[13] the same had more comfort than the fetchings of marcasite in Guiana, or buying of gold ore in Barbary. But I hope the better sort will judge me by themselves, and that the way of deceit is not the way of honour or good opinion. I have herein consumed much time and many crowns, and I had no other respect[14] or desire than to serve her Majesty and my country thereby.

If the Spanish nation had been of like belief to these detractors, we should little have feared or doubted[15] their attempts, wherewith we now are

---

[1] such only as adventured i.e., only those who had invested in the venture.

[2] wrought worked, mined.

[3] borders river banks.

[4] fast impenetrable.

[5] for in June, July … therein Ralegh and his men explored the Orinoco River during the country's rainy season, so this is probably not much of an exaggeration.

[6] ere before.

[7] cockboat a small ship's-boat (the smallest or lightest of floating craft); galiota galliot: a small galley or boat, propelled by sails and oars, used for swift navigation.

[8] open road A road was a sheltered piece of water near the shore where vessels could lie at anchor in safety; "open" implies, however, that this place was also exposed and thus the ship could be easily attacked.

[9] Barbary referring generally to North Africa along the Mediterranean, from Egypt to the Atlantic, and from the sea to the Sahara desert, including Tripoli, Tunis, Algiers, and Morocco (Topographical Dict., p. 45). This rumour and the one Ralegh mentions earlier (that he had never actually gone to Guiana, but had been hiding in Cornwall) were apparently spread by his enemies at court, among them the earl of Oxford and Henry Howard (R. Trevelyan, Sir Walter Raleigh, p. 252).

[10] cozen cheat, defraud, deceive.

[11] lie hard sleep roughly (on the ground, or other hard surface); fare worse i.e., to be worse fed.

[12] ill savours revolting odours.

[13] except unless.

[14] respect aim, end.

[15] doubted suspected [the evil intentions behind].

daily threatened. But if we now consider of the actions both of Charles V[1]—who had the maidenhead of Peru and the abundant treasures of Atabalipa[2]—together with the affairs of the Spanish king now living[3]—what territories he hath purchased; what he hath added to the acts of his predecessors; how many kingdoms he hath endangered; how many armies, garrisons, and navies he hath and doth maintain; the great losses which he hath repaired, as in 88 above 100 sail of great ships with their artillery;[4] and that no year is less unfortunate but that many vessels, treasures, and people are devoured; and yet notwithstanding he beginneth again like a storm to threaten shipwreck to us all—we shall find that these abilities rise not from the trades of sacks[5] and Seville oranges, nor from ought else that either Spain, Portugal, or any of his other provinces produce. It is his Indian gold that endangereth and disturbeth all the nations of Europe: it purchaseth intelligence, creepeth into councils, and setteth bound loyalty at liberty in the greatest monarchies of Europe. If the Spanish king can keep us from foreign enterprises, and from the impeachment[6] of his trades, either by offer of invasion or by besieging us in Britain, Ireland, or elsewhere, he hath then brought the work of our peril in great forwardness. Those princes which abound in treasure have great advantages over the rest, if they once constrain them to a defensive war,[7] where they are driven once a year or oftener to cast lots for their own garments,[8] and from such shall all trades and intercourse be taken away, to the general loss and impoverishment of the kingdom and commonweal so reduced. Besides, when men are constrained to fight, it hath not the same hope as when they are pressed and encouraged by the desire of spoil[9] and riches. Farther it is to be doubted how those that in time of victory seem to affect their neighbour nations will remain after the first view of misfortunes or ill success; to trust also to the doubtfulness of a battle is but a fearful and uncertain adventure, seeing therein fortune is as likely to prevail as virtue. It shall not be necessary to allege all that might be said, and therefore I will thus conclude: that whatsoever kingdom shall be enforced to defend itself may be compared to a body dangerously diseased, which for a season may be preserved with vulgar[10] medicines, but in a short time, and by little and little, the same must needs fall to the ground and be dissolved. I have, therefore, laboured all my life, both according to my small power and persuasion, to advance all those attempts that might either promise return of profit to ourselves, or at last be a let[11] and impeachment to the quiet course and plentiful trades of the Spanish nation, who in my weak judgement by such a war were as easily endangered and brought from his powerfulness as any prince in Europe, if it be considered from how

[1] Charles V (1500-58) (King Charles I of Spain, reigned 1516-56). Under Charles V, the Spanish increased their possessions in the New World, conquering the Inca Empire by 1535, and claiming what is now Mexico and Peru for the Spanish crown. By the time Charles resigned the crown to his heir, Philip II, his possessions in the Americas stretched as far north as California and Texas ("Charles V," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, pp. 163-64).

[2] Atabalipa i.e., Atahuallpa, last ruler of the Inca Empire in Peru. See p. 1135, note 6.

[3] the Spanish king now living Philip II (1527-98), who was even more active than his father in gaining and consolidating Spanish possessions in the Americas, as well as in Europe: he extended and consolidated Spain's control over Mexico, Central America, and South America, and he also conquered Portugal in 1580 ("Philip II," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, p. 487).

[4] as in 88 above 100 sail of great ships with their artillery perhaps a reference to the Spanish losses in their failed invasion of English (the Spanish Armada, 1588), although modern accounts put the number of Spanish losses somewhat lower (only about half of Spain's 131 ships returned home, having lost approximately 5,500 men) (Tudor England, pp. 349, 342).

[5] trades of sacks i.e., trade in sack, a type of dry white wine from Spain and the Canary Islands.

[6] impeachment hindrance, disruption.

[7] if they once constrain them to a defensive war i.e., if the Spanish once force or compel their enemies (those princes who do not abound in treasure) to defend themselves against attack.

[8] where they are driven once a year or oftener to cast lots for their own garments For the prince who lacks the vast wealth that the Spanish derive from trade, conquest, and imperial possessions, a defensive war is like gambling in order to win his own possessions.

[9] spoil plunder, booty, war prizes.

[10] vulgar common, ordinary.

[11] let hindrance.

many kingdoms and nations his revenues are gathered, and those so weak in their own beings, and so far severed from mutual succour.[1] But because such a preparation and resolution is not to be hoped for in haste, and that the time which our enemies embrace cannot be had again to advantage, I will hope that these provinces and that empire now by me discovered shall suffice to enable[2] her Majesty and the whole kingdom with no less quantities of treasure than the King of Spain hath in all the Indies, east and west, which he possesseth. Which if the same be considered and followed, ere the Spaniards reinforce the same, and if her Majesty will undertake it, I will be contented to lose her Highness' favour and good opinion forever, and my life withal, if the same be not found rather to exceed than to equal whatsoever is in this discourse promised or declared. I will now refer the reader to the following discourse, with the hope that the perilous and chargeable[3] labours and endeavours of such as thereby seek the profit and honour of her Majesty and the English nation shall by men of quality and virtue receive such construction, and good acceptance, as themselves would look to be rewarded withal in the like.

The Discovery of Guiana

[...]

We then hastened away towards our purposed discovery, and first I called all the captains of the island together that were enemies to the Spaniards—for there were some which Berreo[4] had brought out of other countries and planted there to eat out and waste those that were natural of the place—and by my Indian interpreter, which I carried out of England, I made them understand that I was the servant of a queen, who was the great casique[5] of the north, and a virgin, and had more casiqui under her than there were trees in their island; that she was an enemy to the Castellani[6] in respect of their tyranny and oppression, and that she delivered all such nations about her as were by them oppressed; and having freed all the coast of the northern world[7] from their servitude had sent me to free them also, and withal to defend the country of Guiana from their invasion and conquest. I showed them her Majesty's picture, which they so admired and honoured as it had been easy to have brought them idolatrous thereof.

The like and a more large discourse I made to the rest of the nations, both in my passing to Guiana and to those of the borders, so as in that part of the world her Majesty is very famous and admirable, whom they now call Ezrabeta Cassipuna Aquerewana, which is as much as: Elizabeth, the great princess or greatest commander.

[...]

---

[1] succour aid, assistance.

[2] enable strengthen, empower.

[3] chargeable burdensome, often in the sense of being "expensive or costly."

[4] Berreo Antonio de Berrío, governor of Trinidad, an experienced soldier who had served Charles V in Italy. In 1593, he wrote to Philip II of Spain, making the case for more men and arms, since he and his small contingent were far outnumbered by Trinidad's native inhabitants. Ralegh recounts how he and his men easily took San José de Oruña, the Spanish capital in Trinidad, sacked the city, burned it to the ground, slaughtered the Spanish, and captured Berrío himself. Given that in 1593 Berrío had ordered eight of Jacob Whiddon's men killed, while Whiddon was engaged on Ralegh's behalf in a reconnaissance mission in Guiana, Ralegh clearly had some personal scores to settle (Trevelyan, Sir Walter Raleigh, p. 226; "Trinidad," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, p. 605).

[5] casique lord or chief.

[6] Castellani i.e., Castilians: Spaniards.

[7] and having freed all the coast of the northern world It seems highly unlikely that Ralegh is referring to the native peoples of the E coast of North America. Although Spain had occupied what is now Florida from 1565, and attempted to bar any other nations, particularly England and France, from gaining a foothold there, they themselves did not manage to establish permanent colonies or military outposts north of Santa Elena, North Carolina. Ralegh's own attempts to establish permanent English settlements in North America were failures, and the English could not claim to have freed the peoples of coastal North America from the oppression of their Spanish conquerors (D.B. Quinn, England and the Discovery of America, 1481-1620 [New York, 1974], especially chapters 10 and 11). Ralegh's claim here must be related to England's role in helping the Protestant Netherlands revolt against its Spanish Catholic overlords.

I made inquiry amongst the most ancient and best travelled of the Orenoqueponi,[1] and I had knowledge[2] of all the rivers between Orenoque and Amazones,[3] and was very desirous to understand the truth of those warlike women,[4] because of some it is believed, of others not. And though I digress from my purpose, yet I will set down that hath been delivered me for truth of those women, and I spoke with a casique or lord of people that told me he had been in the river, and beyond it also. The nations of these women are on the south side of the river in the provinces of Topago, and their chiefest strengths and retraicts[5] are in the islands situate on the south side of the entrance, some sixty leagues within the mouth of the said river. The memories of the like women are very ancient as well in Africa as in Asia: in Africa those that had Medusa[6] for queen; others in Scythia near the rivers of Tanais and Thermadon:[7] we find also that Lampedo and Marthesia were queens of the Amazons.[8] In many histories they are verified to have been, and in divers ages and provinces, but they which are not far from Guiana do accompany with[9] men but once in a year, and for the time of one month, which I gather by their relation to be in April. At that time all kings of the borders assemble, and queens of the Amazons, and after the queens have chosen, the rest cast lots for their valentines.[10] This one month, they feast, dance, and drink of their wines in abundance, and the moon being done,[11] they all depart to their own provinces. If they conceive and be delivered of a son, they return him to the father, if of a daughter they nourish it, and retain it, and as many as have daughters send unto the begetters a present, all being desirous to increase their own sex and kind. But that they cut off the right dug of the breast[12] I do not find to be true. It was farther told me that if in these wars they took any prisoners, that they used to accompany with those also at what time soever, but in the end for certain they put them to death, for they are said to be very cruel and bloodthirsty, especially to such as offer to invade their territories. These Amazons have likewise great store of these plates of gold, which they recover by exchange chiefly for a kind of green stones, which the Spaniards call piedras hijadas, and we use for spleen-stones,[13] and for the disease of the stone we also esteem them. Of these I saw divers in Guiana, and commonly every king or casique hath one, which their wives for the most part wear, and they esteem them as great jewels.

---

1 Orenoqueponi also, Orinoqueponi: inhabitants of Guiana, living to the south of the Orinoco River.

2 I had knowledge i.e., I received information about.

3 Orenoque and Amazones i.e., the Orinoco River and the Amazon, two of the geographical limits of Ralegh's Guiana.

4 those warlike women i.e., the Amazons, a race of women dedicated to war and to a woman-only nation; the origin of the Amazon nation, and their customs and practices are recounted by Justin in his Epitome of the Philippic History of Pompeius Trogus (2nd-4th century CE). See the translation by J.C. Yardley (Atlanta, 1994), pp. 28-31, 2.4. Ralegh was not the only explorer to report on the Amazons. During his journey up the Amazon River, Francisco de Orellana (d. 1545) claimed to have encountered and fought a pitched battle with Amazon warriors on 24 June 1542 (The Times Atlas of World Exploration, ed. F. Fernández-Armesto [New York, 1991], p. 135).

5 retraicts places of retreat or refuge.

6 Medusa The connection between the Gorgon, Medusa, and the Amazons was an ancient one, going back to Diodorus Siculus, and one which was repeated in many Renaissance texts (such as George Sandys' Ovid's Metamorphosis Englished, Mythologized and Represented in Figures, 1632). See K. Schwarz, Tough Love: Amazon Encounters in the English Renaissance (Durham, 2000), pp. 29-31.

7 Tanais and Thermadon in Cappadocia, where classical writers early assumed the land of the Amazons to lie (Justin, Epitome, 2.4.2-3).

8 Lampedo and Marthesia were queens of the Amazons According to Justin, Lampeto (sometimes Lampedo) and Marpesia (Martesia) were two of the most famous Amazon queens; joint rulers of the nation, they alternated responsibility for wars of conquest and defense of their nation's boundaries. They both claimed to be the daughters of Mars, and "after conquering most of Europe, they also seized a number of city-states in Asia," going on to found "Ephesus and several other cities." Martesia and her warriors who remained behind to guard the Amazons' new Asian possessions were later killed (Epitome, 2.4.12-17).

9 accompany with cohabit, have sexual intercourse with.

10 cast lots for their valentines an English custom, where a person of the opposite sex is chosen, drawn by lot, or otherwise determined, on St Valentine's Day (February 14th), as a sweetheart, lover, or special friend for the ensuing year.

11 the moon being done the month being completed.

12 the right dug of the breast See Justin, Epitome, 2.4.11.

13 spleen-stones a kind of jasper used in the treatment of diseases of the spleen; they were also used to treat kidney stones.

[...]

Berreo affirmed that there fell a hundred rivers into Orenoque from the north and south, whereof the least was as big as Rio Grande, that passeth between Popayan and Nuevo Reyno de Granada[1] (Rio Grande being esteemed one of the renowned rivers in all the West Indies, and numbered among the great rivers of the world). But he knew not the names of any of these, but Caroli[2] only, neither from what nations they descended, neither to what provinces they led, for he had no means to discourse with the inhabitants at any time; neither was he curious in these things, being utterly unlearned, and not knowing the east from the west. But of all these I got some knowledge, and of many more, partly by mine own travel and the rest by conference; of some one I learned one, of others the rest, having with me an Indian that spoke many languages and that of Guiana naturally. I sought out all the aged men and such as were greatest travellers, and by the one and the other I came to understand the situations, the rivers, the kingdoms from the east sea to the borders of Peru, and from Orenoque southward as far as Amazones or Maragnon, and the regions of Maria Tamball;[3] and of all the kings of provinces and captains of towns and villages, how they stood in terms of peace or war, and which were friends or enemies the one with the other, without which there can be neither entrance nor conquest in those parts nor elsewhere.

[...]

These Tivitivas[4] are a very goodly people and very valiant, and have the most manly speech and most deliberate that ever I heard of what nation soever. In the summer they have houses on the ground as in other places; in the winter they dwell upon the trees, where they build very artificial[5] towns and villages, as it is written in the Spanish story of the West Indies[6] that those people do in the lowlands near the gulf of Uruba. For between May and September the river of Orenoque riseth thirty foot upright, and then are those islands overflowen twenty foot high above the level of the ground, saving some few raised grounds in the middle of them, and for this cause they are enforced to live in this manner. They never eat of anything that is set or sown, and as at home they use neither planting nor other manurance,[7] so when they come abroad they refuse to feed of ought but of that which nature without labour

[1] Rio Grande, that passeth between Popayan and Nuevo Reyno de Granada in Ralegh's geography, the Great River (the Magdalena River) that passes between Popayan (a region that was located in SW Colombia) and the New Kingdom of Granada (generally, the region around Santa Fé de Bogatá, Colombia). See "Colombia," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, pp. 182-85.

[2] Caroli i.e., the Caroní River, which joins the Orinoco at Seiba and San Thomé. That Berrío had such a scanty knowledge of Guiana's geography is very improbable: Berrío, in his own search for the golden city of El Dorado, had travelled himself overland from Bogatá to Guiana and down the whole length of the Orinoco River, a journey of some seventeen months; however, his "second journey was even longer," lasting from 1585 to 1588, but it was this journey which convinced him that finally discovering El Dorado depended upon mastering the Orinoco River, and that Trinidad was an ideal base of operations. His last journey in 1590 is the one that Ralegh partly recounts earlier in the Discovery, and it involved Berrío's explorations of the Caroní River and his conflict with the chieftain, Morequito, who was eventually killed by Berrío's men. See Trevelyan, Sir Walter Raleigh, pp. 207-08, 218-21.

[3] Amazones or Maragnon the Amazon River and its environs (the Spanish sometimes called the Amazon, the Marañon) (Times Atlas of World Exploration, p. 130); regions of Maria Tamball not identified.

[4] Tivitivas a native people of Guiana, living N of the Orinoco River, between the River of the Red Cross and the ocean.

[5] artificial ingeniously constructed.

[6] the Spanish story of the West Indies This might refer to any one of a number of works written on the customs of the New World's native peoples, perhaps, Toribio de Benavente's (Motolinía) Historia de los Indios de la Nueva España (1541), or Bartolomé de Las Casas's massive comparative ethnology Apologética historia summaria (1559). After 1577, Philip II of Spain banned the further production of such ethnographic literature, and had confiscated those books and manuscripts already produced. See J. LaFaye, "Literature and Intellectual Life in Colonial Spanish America," Cambridge History of Latin America, vol. 2, ed. L. Bethell (Cambridge, 1984), pp. 663-67.

[7] manurance cultivation.

bringeth forth. They use the tops of palmitos[1] for bread, and kill deer, fish and porks for the rest of their sustenance. They have also many sorts of fruits that grow in the woods, and great variety of birds and fowl.

And if to speak of them were not tedious and vulgar, surely we saw in those passages of very rare colours and forms, not elsewhere to be found, forasmuch as I have either seen or read. Of these people, those that dwell upon the branches of Orenoque, called Capuri and Macureo, are for the most part carpenters of canoas,[2] for they make the most and fairest houses, and sell them into Guiana for gold, and into Trinidad for tobacco, in the excessive taking whereof they exceed all nations. And notwithstanding the moistness of the air in which they live, the hardness of their diet, and the great labours they suffer to hunt, fish, and fowl for their living, in all my life, either in the Indies or in Europe, did I never behold a more goodly or better-favoured[3] people, or a more manly. They were wont[4] to make war upon all nations, and especially on the cannibals, so as none durst without a good strength trade by those rivers. But of late they are at peace with their neighbours, all holding the Spaniards for a common enemy. When their commanders die, they use great lamentation, and when they think the flesh of their bodies is putrefied and fallen from the bones, then they take up the carcass again and hang it in the casique's house that died, and deck his skull with feathers of all colours, and hang all his gold plates about the bones of his arms, thighs, and legs. Those nations which are called Arwacas, which dwell on the south of Orenoque (of which place and nation our Indian pilot was), are dispersed in many other places, and do use to beat the bones of their lords into powder, and their wives and friends drink it all in their several sorts of drinks.

[...]

On both sides of this river,[5] we passed the most beautiful country that ever mine eyes beheld. And whereas all that we had seen before was nothing but woods, prickles, bushes, and thorns, here we beheld plains of twenty miles in length, the grass short and green, and in divers parts groves of trees by themselves, as if they had been by all the art and labour in the world so made of purpose. And still as we rowed, the deer came down, feeding by the waterside, as if they had been used to a keeper's call.[6] Upon this river there were great store of fowl, and of many sorts; we saw in it divers sorts of strange fishes, and of marvellous bigness, but for lagartos[7] it exceeded, for there were thousands of those ugly serpents, and the people call it for the abundance of them the river of lagartos, in their language. I had a Negro, a very proper young fellow that, leaping out of the galley to swim in the mouth of this river, was in all our sights taken and devoured with one of those lagartos.

[...]

[...] and as I was creeping through the bushes,[8] I saw an Indian basket hidden, which was the refiner's basket, for I found in it his quicksilver, saltpeter, and divers things for the trial of metals, and also the dust of such ore as he had refined. But in those canoas which escaped there was a good quantity of ore and gold. I then landed more men, and offered £500 to what soldier soever could take one of those three Spaniards that we thought were landed. But our labours were in vain in that behalf, for they put themselves into one of the small canoas, and so,

[1] palmitos palmetto: a smaller variety of palm tree (its fruit grows on the top of the tree).

[2] canoas canoes (a native Haitian word); a boat fashioned by hollowing out a single tree trunk.

[3] better-favoured more handsome or good-looking.

[4] wont accustomed.

[5] this river the Orinoco.

[6] keeper's call gamekeeper's call.

[7] lagartos alligators (Spanish, lagarto).

[8] and as I was creeping through the bushes Ralegh and his men, having come across a group of Spaniards and Arwacas in four canoes, pursued them to the shore and into the bush. Although the Spaniards escaped, the captain of the Arwacas later told Ralegh that they consisted of a cavallero (a gentleman trained in arms), a soldier, and a refiner.

while the greater canoas were in taking, they escaped. But seeking after the Spaniards, we found the Arwacas hidden in the woods, which were pilots for the Spaniards and rowed their canoas; of which I kept the chiefest for a pilot, and carried him with me to Guiana, by whom I understood where and in what countries the Spaniards had laboured for gold, though I made not the same known to all. For when the springs began to break, and the rivers to raise themselves so suddenly as by no means we could abide the digging of any mine, especially for that the richest are defended with rocks of hard stones, which we call the white spar, and that it required both time, men, and instruments fit for such a work, I thought it best not to hover thereabouts, lest if the same had been perceived by the company, there would have been by this time many barks[1] and ships set out; and perchance[2] other nations would also have gotten of ours for pilots, so as both ourselves might have been prevented, and all our care taken for good usage of the people been utterly lost by those that only respect present profit, and such violence or insolence offered as the nations which are borderers would have changed their desire of our love and defence into hatred and violence. And for any longer stay to have brought a more quantity (which I hear hath been often objected) whosoever had seen or proved the fury of that river after it began to arise, and had been a month and odd days as we were from hearing ought from our ships, leaving them meanly-manned, above 400 miles off, would perchance have turned somewhat sooner than we did, if all the mountains had been gold or rich stones. And to say the truth, all the branches and small rivers which fell into Orenoque were raised with such speed as, if we waded them over the shoes in the morning outward, we were covered to the shoulders homeward the very same day. And to stay to dig out gold with our nails had been opus laboris, but not ingenii:[3] such a quantity as would have served our turns we could not have had, but a discovery of the mines to our infinite disadvantage we had made, and that could have been the best profit of farther search or stay; for those mines are not easily broken, nor opened in haste, and I could have returned a good quantity of gold ready cast,[4] if I had not shot at another mark than present profit.

The Arwacan pilot with the rest feared that we would have eaten them, or otherwise have put them to some cruel death, for the Spaniards—to the end that none of the people in the passage towards Guiana or in Guiana itself might come to speech with us—persuaded all the nations that we were men eaters and cannibals. But when the poor men and women had seen us, and that we gave them meat, and to everyone something or other, which was rare and strange to them, they began to conceive the deceit and purpose of the Spaniards, who indeed (as they confessed) took from them both their wives and daughters daily, and used them for the satisfying of their own lusts, especially such as they took in this manner by strength. But I protest before the majesty of the living God that I neither know nor believe that any of our company, one or other, by violence or otherwise, ever knew[5] any of their women; and yet we saw many hundreds, and had many in our power, and of those very young and excellently-favoured, which came among us without deceit,[6] stark naked.

Nothing got us more love among them than this usage, for I suffered not any man to take from any of the nations so much as a piña or a potato root[7] without giving them contentment,[8] nor any man so much as to offer to touch any of their wives or daughters. Which course, so contrary to the Spaniards (who tyrannize over them in all things), drew them to admire her Majesty, whose

---

1 barks small ships.

2 perchance perhaps.

3 opus laboris but not ingenii Latin, "a work of labour, but not of wit" (i.e., laborious work, but not [an] intelligent [thing to do]).

4 ready cast i.e., already melted and moulded into the shape of an ingot.

5 knew i.e., had sexual intercourse with.

6 without deceit without mistake, assuredly; or, perhaps, referring to the women's attitude, "innocently, without expecting any deceit or harm from the English."

7 piña pineapple; potato-root the tuberous root of the sweet potato.

8 contentment payment.

commandment I told them it was, and also wonderfully to honour our nation. But I confess it was a very impatient work[1] to keep the meaner sort from spoil[2] and stealing, when we came to their houses; which because in all I could not prevent, I caused my Indian interpreter at every place when we departed to know of the loss or wrong done, and if ought were stolen or taken by violence, either the same was restored, and the party punished in their sight, or else it was paid for to their uttermost demand. They also much wondered at us after they heard that we had slain the Spaniards at Trinidad,[3] for they were before resolved that no nation of Christians durst abide their presence;[4] and they wondered more when I had made them know of the great overthrow that her Majesty's army and fleet have given them of late years in their own countries.[5]

[...]

When we came to his town[6] we found two cassiques, whereof one of them was a stranger that had been up the river in trade, and his boats, people, and wife encamped at the port where we anchored, and the other was of that country, a follower of Toparimaca. They lay each of them in a cotton hamaca,[7] which we call brazil beds, and two women attending them with six cups and a little ladle to fill them out of an earthen pitcher of wine, and so they drank each of them three of those cups at a time, one to the other, and in this sort they drink drunk[8] at their feasts and meetings.

That cassique that was a stranger had his wife staying at the port where we anchored, and in all my life I have seldom seen a better-favoured woman. She was of good stature, with black eyes, fat of body, of an excellent countenance, her hair almost as long as herself, tied up again in pretty knots, and it seemed she stood not in that awe of her husband as the rest, for she spoke and discoursed, and drank among the gentlemen and captains, and was very pleasant, knowing her own comeliness and taking great pride therein. I have seen a lady in England so like her as, but for the difference of colour, I would have sworn might have been the same.

[...]

The next day we arrived at the port of Morequito[9] and anchored there, sending away one of our pilots to seek the King of Aromaia, uncle to Morequito, slain by Berreo as aforesaid.[10] The next day following, before noon, he came to us on foot from his house, which was fourteen English miles, (himself being 110 years old) and returned on foot the same day, and with him many of the borderers, with many women and children, that came to wonder at our nation and to bring us down victual. [...]

After this old king had rested awhile in a little tent that I caused to be set up, I began by my interpreter to discourse with him of the death of Morequito, his predecessor, and afterward of the Spaniards; and ere I went any farther I made him

---

1 impatient work i.e., a labour that provoked (in Ralegh) much irritation.

2 spoil plunder.

3 that we had slain the Spaniards at Trinidad See p. 1126, note 4.

4 I.e., they (the Arwacans) were resolved (assured or convinced by the Spaniards), that no nation of Christians dared withstand, face, or encounter them (the Spanish).

5 the great overthrow ... countries After the Spanish Armada (1588), England and Spain were at war, and the English participated in victories over the Spanish in the Netherlands and northern France (between 1589 and 1595). Under the joint command of Charles Howard and the earl of Essex, an English fleet sacked and burned Cadiz, as well as Faro in southern Portugal; some attacks on Spanish possessions in the Americas were also successful (the 1598 sacking of Puerto Rico). See Tudor England, especially pp. 343-51.

6 his town i.e., the town which was part of the domain of Toparimaca, whom Ralegh describes a little earlier as a "lord of that border" (i.e., of that land bordering on a particular stretch of the river).

7 hamaca hammock.

8 they drink drunk i.e., they drink until they are drunk.

9 port of Morequito a settlement near the mouth of the Caroní River (a six-day journey up the Orinoco), about 600 miles inland.

10 As Ralegh notes below, the king's name is Topiawari. In Ralegh's terms, the province of Aromaia is located on the Caroli River, approximately 50 miles upriver from where the Caroli meets the Orenoque. See p. 1128, note 2.

know the cause of my coming thither, whose servant I was, and that the Queen's pleasure was I should undertake the voyage for their defence, and to deliver them from the tyranny of the Spaniards, dilating at large (as I had done before to those of Trinidad) her Majesty's greatness, her justice, her charity to all oppressed nations, with as many of the rest of her beauties and virtues as either I could express or they conceive; all which being with great admiration attentively heard and marvellously admired, I began to sound[1] the old man as touching Guiana and the state thereof, what sort of commonwealth it was, how governed, of what strength and policy, how far it extended, and what nations were friends or enemies adjoining, and finally of the distance and way to enter the same. He told me that himself and his people with all those down the river towards the sea, as far as Emeria, the province of Carapana, were of Guiana, but that they called themselves Orenoqueponi, because they bordered the great river of Orenoque, and that all the nations between the river and those mountains in sight, called Wacarima, were of the same cast and appellation; and that on the other side of those mountains of Wacarima, there was a large plain (which after I discovered in my return) called the valley of Amariocapana; in all that valley the people were also of the ancient Guianians. I asked what nations those were which inhabited on the further side of those mountains, beyond the valley of Amariocapana. He answered with a great sigh (as a man which had inward feeling of the loss of his country and liberty, especially for that his eldest son was slain in a battle on that side of the mountains, whom he most entirely loved) that he remembered in his father's lifetime, when he was very old and himself a young man, that there came down into that large valley of Guiana a nation from so far off as the sun slept (for such were his own words), with so great a multitude as they could not be numbered nor resisted; and that they wore large coats, and hats of crimson colour—which colour he expressed by showing a piece of red wood wherewith my tent was supported—and that they were called Oreiones, and Epuremei, those that had slain and rooted out so many of the ancient people as there were leaves in the wood upon all the trees, and had now made themselves lords of all, even to that mountain foot called Curaa, saving only[2] of two nations, the one called Iwarawaqueri and the other Cassipagotos; and that in the last battle fought between the Epuremei and the Iwarawaqueri, his eldest son was chosen to carry to the aid of the Iwarawaqueri a great troop of the Orenoqueponi, and was there slain with all his people and friends; and that he had now remaining but one son; and farther told me that those Epuremei had built a great town called Macureguarai at the said mountain foot, at the beginning of the great plains of Guiana, which have no end; and that their houses have many rooms, one over the other, and that therein the great King of the Oreiones and Epuremei kept 3,000 men to defend the borders against them, and withal daily to invade and slay them; but that of late years, since the Christians offered to invade his territories and those frontiers, they were all at peace, and traded one with another, saving only the Iwarawaqueri and those other nations upon the head of the river of Caroli, called Cassipagotos, which we afterwards discovered, each one holding the Spaniard for a common enemy.

After he had answered thus far, he desired leave to depart, saying that he had far to go, that he was old and weak, and was everyday called for by death, which was also his own phrase. I desired him to rest with us that night, but I could not entreat him. But he told me that at my return from the country above, he would again come to us, and in the meantime provide for us the best he could of all that his country yielded. The same night he returned to Orocotona, his own town, so as he went that day twenty-eight miles, the weather being very hot, the country being situate between 4 and 5 degrees of the equinoctial.[3] This Topiawari is held for the proudest and wisest of all the

[1] to sound to question cautiously and indirectly.

[2] saving only with the exception of only.

[3] of the equinoctial from the terrestrial equator.

Orenoqueponi, and so he behaved himself towards me in all his answers at my return, as I marvelled to find a man of that gravity and judgement, and of so good discourse, that had no help of learning nor breed.[1]

[...]

To make mention of the several[2] beasts, birds, fishes, fruits, flowers, gums, sweet woods, and of their several religions and customs would for the first require as many volumes as those of Gesnerus, and for the rest another bundle of Decades.[3] The religion of the Epuremei is the same which the Ingas,[4] emperors of Peru, used, which may be read in Cieca[5] and other Spanish stories, how they believe the immortality of the soul, worship the sun, and bury with them alive their best beloved wives and treasure, as they likewise do in Pegu in the East Indies,[6] and other places. The Orenoqueponi bury not their wives with them but their jewels, hoping to enjoy them again. The Arwacas dry the bones of their lords, and their wives and friends drink them in powder. In the graves of the Peruvians, the Spaniards found their greatest abundance of treasure. The like also is to be found among these people in every province. They have all many wives, and the lords five-fold to the common sort. Their wives never eat with their husbands, nor among the men, but serve their husbands at meals, and afterwards feed by themselves. Those that are past their younger years make all their bread and drink, and work their cotton beds, and do all else of service and labour, for the men do nothing but hunt, fish, play, and drink, when they are out of the wars.

I will enter no further into discourse of their manners, laws and customs. And because I have not myself seen the cities of Inga, I cannot avow on my credit what I have heard, although it be very likely that the Emperor Inga hath built and erected as magnificent palaces in Guiana as his ancestors did in Peru, which were for their riches and rareness most marvellous and exceeding all in Europe, and I think of the world, China excepted; which also the Spaniards (which I had) assured me to be of truth, as also the nations of the borderers, who being but salvaios[7] to those of the land do cause much treasure to be buried with them, for I was informed of one of the cassiqui of the valley of Amariocapana which had buried with him, a little before our arrival, a chair of gold most curiously wrought, which was made either in

---

[1] breed more commonly, "breeding": the training and education of the young, but also those qualities which individuals inherit from their parents and more generally their lineage.

[2] several individual.

[3] Gesnerus Conrad Gesner (1516-65), author of an extensive zoological encyclopaedia, Historia Animalium (The History of Animals, 5 vols., compiled between 1551 and 1558); Decades Pietro Martire d'Anghiera (1457-1526), the Italian humanist sometimes called "the first historian of America," published De Orbe Novo ... decades (Alcalá, 1516; English translation published, 1555), an account of the Spanish conquest of the Indies (J. LaFaye, "Literature and Intellectual Life in Colonial Spanish America," Cambridge History of Latin America, vol. 2, p. 678); he also compiled Opus epistolarum, a collection of 813 letters many of which "concern the discovery of America and events in the New World from 1488 to 1525" (E.J. Polak, "Letterbooks," Encycl. Renaissance, vol. 3, p. 417).

[4] Ingas i.e., the Incas. Originally migrants from the Lake Titicaca area, the Incas had (by the beginning of the sixteenth century) created a vast "empire that extended from Quito in Ecuador to Tucumán in Argentina"; "Inga" is also the name of one of their emperors (see below). Although the Spaniards referred to all the peoples in this area as Incas, the term is really only accurately applied to the ruling elite. See "Incas," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, pp. 323-25.

[5] in Cieca Pedro Cieza de León (1518-?60) is the author of a four-part study of Peru, the Incas, and Francisco Pizarro's conquest of the Inca Empire. Written between 1541 and 1550, his work was based on his own extensive travels in the New World, and enabled by his appointment as official chronicler in Peru. Only the first part was published during his lifetime (Seville, 1553); parts two and three had to wait until the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, respectively; the fourth part has been lost ("Cieza de León, Pedro," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, pp. 175-76). For the Incas' belief in the immortality of the soul, their worship of the Sun, and their funeral customs, see the following: The Second Part of the Chronicle of Peru, trans. and ed. C. Markham (New York, n.d.), pp. 19, 94, 103-04, and 115; The Discovery and Conquest of Peru (Part Three of The Chronicle of Peru, trans. and ed. A.P. Cook and N.D. Cook [Durham, 1998], pp. 226, 228-29, 259, 267-69, and 285). Cieza de León also notes that women and boys (and sometimes men) would be killed as well as commit suicide upon the death of their lord in order to accompany him to Heaven as his servants.

[6] the East Indies the name formerly given to SE Asia.

[7] salvaios Spanish, "savages."

Macureguarai adjoining or in Manoa.[1] But if we should have grieved them in their religion at the first, before they had been taught better, and have digged up their graves, we had lost them all. And therefore I held my first resolution: that her Majesty should either accept or refuse the enterprise ere anything should be done that might in any sort hinder the same. And if Peru had so many heaps of gold, whereof those Ingas were princes, and that they delighted so much therein, no doubt but this which now liveth and reigneth in Manoa hath the same humour, and I am assured hath more abundance of gold within his territory than all Peru and the West Indies.

[...]

To conclude, Guiana is a country that hath yet her maidenhead,[2] never sacked, turned, nor wrought: the face of the earth hath not been torn, nor the virtue and salt of the soil spent by manurance; the graves have not been opened for gold; the mines not broken with sledges, nor their images pulled down out of their temples. It hath never been entered by any army of strength, and never conquered or possessed by any Christian prince. It is besides so defensible, that if two forts be builded in one of the provinces which I have seen, the flood setteth in so near the bank, where the channel also lieth, that no ship can pass up but within a pike's length of the artillery, first of the one, and afterwards of the other; which two forts will be a sufficient guard both to the empire of Inga, and to a hundred other several[3] kingdoms, lying within the said river, even to the city of Quito in Peru.

There is, therefore, great difference between the easiness of the conquest of Guiana, and the defense of it being conquered, and the West or East Indies. Guiana hath but one entrance by the sea (if it have that) for any vessels of burden, so as whosoever shall first possess it, it shall be found inaccessible for any enemy, except he come in wherries, barges, or canoas, or else in flat-bottomed boats; and if he do offer to enter it in that manner, the woods are so thick 200 miles together upon the rivers of such entrance, as a mouse cannot sit in a boat unhit from the bank. By land it is more impossible to approach, for it hath the strongest situation of any region under the sun, and is so environed with impassable mountains on every side as it is impossible to victual any company in the passage; which hath been well proved by the Spanish nation, who since the conquest of Peru have never left five years free from attempting this empire or discovering some way into it, and yet of twenty-three several gentlemen, knights, and noblemen, there was never any that knew which way to lead an army by land, or to conduct ships by sea, anything near the said country. [...]

Besides, by keeping one good fort, or building one town of strength, the whole empire is guarded, and whatsoever companies shall be afterwards planted within the land, although in twenty several provinces, those shall be able all to reunite themselves upon any occasion, either by the way of one river, or be able to march by land without either wood, bog, or mountain. Whereas, in the West Indies there are few towns or provinces that can succour or relieve one the other, either by land or sea: by land the countries are either desert, mountainous, or strong enemies; by sea, if any man invade to the eastward, those to the west cannot in many months turn against the breeze and easter[n] wind, besides the Spaniards are therein so dispersed as they are nowhere strong but in Nueuva Hispania[4] only. The sharp mountains, the thorns, and poisoned prickles, the sandy and deep ways in the valleys, the smothering heat and air, and want of water in other places are their only and best defence, which (because those nations that invade them are not victualled or provided to stay, neither have any place to friend

[1] Macureguarai … or in Manoa On the title page of Guiana, Ralegh identifies Manoa as "the great and Golden City ... (which the Spaniards call El Dorado)".

[2] maidenhead virginity.

[3] several individual.

[4] Nueva Hispania New Spain.

adjoining) do serve them instead of good arms and great multitudes. The West Indies were first offered her Majesty's grandfather by Columbus,[1] a stranger[2] in whom there might be doubt of deceit,[3] and besides it was then thought incredible that there were such and so many lands and regions never written of before. This empire is made known to her Majesty by her own vassal, and by him that oweth to her more duty than an ordinary subject, so that it shall ill sort with the many graces and benefits which I have received to abuse her Highness either with fables or imaginations. The country is already discovered, many nations won to her Majesty's love and obedience, and those Spaniards which have latest and longest laboured about the conquest beaten out, discouraged, and disgraced, which among these nations were thought invincible. Her Majesty may in this enterprise employ all those soldiers and gentlemen that are younger brethren, and all captains and chieftains that want employment, and the charge will be only the first setting out in victualling and arming them; for after the first or second year I doubt not but to see in London a contractation-house of more receipt[4] for Guiana than there is now in Seville for the West Indies.

And I am resolved that if there were but a small army afoot in Guiana, marching towards Manoa, the chief city of Inga, he would yield her Majesty by composition[5] so many hundred thousand pounds yearly, as should both defend all enemies abroad and defray all expenses at home, and that he would besides pay a garrison of 3,000 or 4,000 soldiers very royally to defend him against other nations; for he cannot but know how his predecessors, yea how his own great-uncles Guascar and Atibalipa, sons to Guanacapa, emperor of Peru, were (while they contended for the empire) beaten out by the Spaniards,[6] and that, both of late years and ever since the said conquest, the Spaniards have sought the passages and entry of his country. And of their cruelties used to the borderers he cannot be ignorant. In which respects, no doubt but he will be brought to tribute with great gladness; if not, he hath neither shot nor iron weapon in all his empire, and therefore may easily be conquered.

And I farther remember that Berreo confessed to me and others (which I protest before the majesty of God to be true) that there was found among prophecies in Peru (at such time as the empire was reduced to the Spanish obedience) in their chiefest temples, amongst divers others which foreshowed the loss of the said empire, that from Inglatierra[7] those Ingas should be again, in time to come, restored and delivered from the servitude of the said conquerors. And I hope, as we with these few hands have displanted the first garrison and driven them out of the said country, so her Majesty will give order for the rest, and either defend it and hold it as tributary, or conquer and keep it as empress of the same. For whatsoever prince shall possess it, shall be greatest, and if

[1] The West Indies ... Columbus In 1489, when Columbus was seeking out patrons for his voyage to discover a western route to Asia, he wrote to Henry VII asking him to finance this venture. When Henry refused, Columbus found funding from Isabella of Spain; he discovered Cuba and the mainland of America (J. Ridley, The Tudor Age [London, 2002], p. 210).

[2] stranger foreigner.

[3] doubt of deceit suspicion or fear of deception.

[4] contractation-house an exchange or treasury in Seville where contracts were made in connection with the West Indies trade; of more receipt generating more profit.

[5] by composition i.e., in obedience to the terms set out in a treaty or truce.

[6] for he cannot but know how his predecessors ... by the Spaniards In the early 1530s, Francisco Pizarro conquered the Inca Empire (in Peru) for Spain with a tiny contingent of approximately 180 soldiers and 27 horses. Riven by civil war and its chaotic aftermath, the empire was in disarray and unable to defend itself when Pizarro arrived. Atahuallpa, heir to the northern part of the Inca Empire after the death of his father, Huayna Cápac, had wrested away from his brother, Huáscar (here, Guascar), the southern half of the empire. Not taking the Spanish seriously and allowing his own civil strife to take priority over the foreign threat, Atahuallpa was quickly defeated. Having killed his brother in order to keep him from allying himself with the Spanish, Atahuallpa was in turn, along with the rest of his nobles, killed by Pizarro. The empire's conquered peoples, accustomed to the autocratic rule and rigidly hierarchical nature of Inca society, could not effectively resist the Spanish after the warrior-elite had been annihilated. See "Atahuallpa," Hist. Dict. Spanish Empire, p. 57; and "Incas," ibid., pp. 323-25.

[7] Inglatierra Spanish, "Inglaterra" (England).

the King of Spain enjoy it, he will become unresistable. Her Majesty hereby shall confirm and strengthen the opinions of all nations as touching her great and princely actions. And where the south border of Guiana reacheth to the dominion and empire of the Amazons, those women shall hereby hear the name of a virgin, which is not only able to defend her own territories and her neighbours, but also to invade and conquer so great empires and so far removed.

To speak more at this time, I fear would be but troublesome: I trust in God, this being true will suffice, and that he which is King of all kings, and Lord of lords, will put it into her heart which is lady of ladies to possess it; if not, I will judge those men worthy to be kings thereof that by her grace and leave will undertake it of themselves.

—1596

Sir John Davies
1569-1626

John Davies was born in Tisbury, Wiltshire, and although some sources report that his father was a prosperous tanner, others suggest more conventional gentry origins for the man who was to rise to be, by the time of his death, lord chief justice of England. The youngest of three brothers, Davies was educated at Winchester and Queen's College (Oxford), entering the Middle Temple (London) in 1588, and was called to the bar in 1595, the conjectured publication date of his first work (in collaboration with Christopher Marlowe), Epigrams and Elegies. Composed around 1594, Orchestra, or a Poem of Dancing (published 1596) was, however, Davies's first major work: a philosophical meditation on the cosmos and the nature of love. His promising future as a lawyer suffered a severe setback, however, when he violently assaulted Richard Martin, fellow lawyer, member of the Middle Temple, and dedicatee of Orchestra. Disbarred as a result in February 1598, Davies undertook a forced "retirement" to Oxford, where he composed his other famous poetic works: Nosce Teipsum (1599; 2nd edition 1602), a discussion of the significance of humanist learning and the immortality of the soul; and Hymns of Astraea (1599), a collection of acrostic panegyrics in celebration of Queen Elizabeth I. Readmitted to the Middle Temple in 1601 after having made a public apology to Martin, Davies found his political and legal career on the upswing. In 1603 he was made solicitor-general for Ireland, a post which he held until 1606 when he was made attorney-general for Ireland (until 1619). During his tenure in these posts he energetically promoted English national interests: he convinced English authorities to expel Roman Catholic priests from Ireland and enforce the attendance of the native population at Protestant services; he later encouraged and helped carry out the forced dispossession of northern Irish inhabitants in favour of English and Scottish migrants (the plantation of Ulster); he also tried to establish English property law and abolish Irish forms that were tied to clan allegiances. After completing his service in Ireland, he returned to England where he became a circuit judge, King's sergeant, and (in 1621) the member of Parliament for Newcastle-under-Lyme. His marriage to Eleanor Touchet (Audley) in 1609 produced three children, but the relationship seems to have been a difficult one. Writer of numerous visionary and prophetic tracts, Eleanor Davies made herself increasingly unpopular at the English court. When Davies burned some of his wife's prophecies in 1625, apparently in an attempt to silence her, she predicted that he would die within three years. He died in 1626, just before he was to take up his post as lord chief justice of England.

EDITIONS: Epigrammes and elegies by I.D. and C.M. At Middleborugh [i.e., London?]: [s.n., ca. 1599]. STC 6350; "Gulling Sonnets," from The Complete Poems of Sir John Davies, 2 vols., ed. A.B. Grosart, London, 1876, vol. 2, pp. 53-62; "Of Human Knowledge," contained in Nosce teipsum: This oracle expounded in two elegies 1. Of humane knowledge. 2. Of the soule of man, and the immortalitie thereof. London: Printed by Richard Field for John Standish, 1599. STC 6355; Hymnes of Astraea in acrosticke verse. London: Printed [by R. Field] for I. S[tandish], 1599. STC 6351.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: From Orchestra, Or a Poem of Dancing (1596).

from Epigrams and Elegies

By I.D. and C.M.[1]
At Middelburg.[2]

Ad Musam (Epigram 1)[3]

Fly, merry Muse, unto that merry town
Where thou mayst plays, revels, and triumphs see,
The house of fame and theatre of renown
Where all good wits and spirits love to be.

Fall in between their hands that praise and love thee,
And be to them a laughter and a jest;
But as for them which, scorning, shall reprove thee,
Disdain their wits and think thine own the best.

But if thou find any so gross and dull
That think I do to private taxing[4] lean,
Bid him go hang, for he is but a gull,[5]
And knows not what an epigram doth mean:
Which taxeth under a particular name
A general vice that merits public blame.

[1] I.D. John Davies; C.M. Christopher Marlowe (1564-93), poet and dramatist. While Davies is the sole author of the epigrams in this volume, Marlowe is responsible for the elegies (a translation of Ovid's Amores).

[2] no date of publication. Internal evidence places it between 1594 and 1596, with most critics adopting J.M. Nosworthy's conjecture of 1595. See J.L. Sanderson, Sir John Davies (Boston, 1975), pp. 39-40. Middelburg (Middleburgh or Middleborough) is in Holland, and the book may have been published there at Davies's or a friend's request, since its satiric and erotic content meant that it would have been difficult to get a licence for its printing in England. However, it is also possible that the title page is deliberately misleading, and may have the added purpose of poking fun at the morally censorious attitudes that would have frowned on such a work, since Middelburg's presses often published Puritan works (Sanderson, Sir John Davies, p. 40).

[3] Latin, "To the Muse."

[4] private taxing the censure or reproof of particular persons.

[5] gull simpleton, fool.

In Rufum (Epigram 3)[6]

Rufus the courtier, at the theatre
Leaving the best and most conspicuous place,[7]
Doth either to the stage himself transfer[8]
Or through a grate[9] doth show his doubtful face;

For that the clamorous fry of Inns of Court[10]
Fills up the private rooms of greater price,[11]
And such a place where all may have resort
He, in his singularity,[12] doth despise.

Yet doth not his particular humour[13] shun
The common stews[14] and brothels of the town,
Though all the world in troops do thither run,

[6] Latin, "On Rufus."

[7] the best and most conspicuous place In the public theatres of the 1590s, this would be the lords' room, which by the time Thomas Dekker writes his famous advice on "How a Gallant Should Behave Himself in a Playhouse" has become an unfashionable place for the elite to sit. Dekker notes that the lords' room "is now but the stage's suburbs" (The Gull's Hornbook, 1609, ed. R.B. McKerrow [New York, 1971], p. 50). London's suburbs (such as Southwark where the Globe and other theatres were located) were famous for their brothels.

[8] to the stage himself transfer Sitting on the stage became in the 1590s the preferred seating for fashionable young gentlemen. By the early seventeenth century, this behaviour had become a common topic for satire (Dekker, Gull's Hornbook, pp. 50-53).

[9] through a grate According to Malone (Shakespeare by Boswell, 3.81), the grate refers to "one of the two boxes (sometimes called private boxes) which were situated on each side of the balcony or upper stage."

[10] For that because; fry a swarm of young or insignificant persons; Inns of Court the Inner Temple, the Middle Temple, Lincoln's Inn, and Gray's Inn, where the period's lawyers and barristers were trained. Students at the Inns were notorious for their licentious and riotous behaviour.

[11] the private rooms of greater price i.e., the boxes where wealthier members of the audience could sit (W. Archer and W.J. Lawrence, "The Playhouse," Shakespeare's England, 2.285).

[12] singularity assumption of a deliberately independent stance, meant to call attention to oneself.

[13] humour characteristic mental outlook, dominant personality trait, or cast of mind.

[14] stews public bathhouses (frequently employed in the Elizabethan sex trade).

Clean and unclean, the gentle and the clown.[1]
Then why should Rufus in his pride abhor
A common seat, that loves a common whore?

In Titum (Epigram 6)

Titus, the brave and valorous young gallant,
Three years together in this town hath been,
Yet my Lord Chancellor's tomb[2] he hath not seen,
Nor the new water-work, nor the elephant.[3]
I cannot tell the cause without a smile:
He hath been in the Counter[4] all this while.

In Severum (Epigram 13)[5]

The Puritan Severus oft doth read
This text that doth pronounce vain speech a sin,
That thing defiles a man that doth proceed
From out the mouth, not that which enters in;[6]
Hence is it that we seldom hear him swear,
And thereof like a Pharisee he vaunts,[7]
But he devours more capons[8] in a year
Than would suffice a hundred Protestants;
And sooth, those sectaries are gluttons all,
As well the threadbare cobbler as the knight;
For those poor slaves which have not wherewithal
Feed on the rich till they devour them quite;
And so, like Pharaoh's kine, they eat up clean
Those that be fat, yet still themselves be lean.[9]

In Gerontem (Epigram 20)[10]

Geron, whose mouldy memory corrects
Old Holinshed,[11] our famous chronicler,
With moral rules and policy collects
Out of all actions done this fourscore[12] year;

Accounts the time of every odd[13] event
Not from Christ's birth nor from the prince's reign
But from some other famous accident[14]
Which in men's general notice doth remain—

The siege of Bulloigne and the plaguy sweat,[15]
The going to Saint Quintine's and New Haven,[16]

---

[1] Clean and unclean i.e., the good and the bad. See Ecclesiastes 9:2: "... one fate comes to all, to the righteous and the wicked, to the good and the evil, to the clean and the unclean ..."; the gentle and the clown the gentleman and the rustic, country-dweller.

[2] my Lord Chancellor's tomb That of Sir Christopher Hatton (c. 1540-91); his ostentatious memorial was erected in St Paul's Cathedral in 1592.

[3] new water-work Erected in a large, impressive building in 1594-95, this pumping station provided water from the Thames to London's middle and western districts ("water work," OED, 2a; Survey London, 1.18); the elephant Although a common name then (and now) for taverns, this refers to an actual elephant, a tourist attraction mentioned in Donne's "Satire I," l.81.

[4] the Counter a debtors' prison in London.

[5] Latin, "On Severus" ("severus," means "severe" or "rigid").

[6] That thing defiles ... in When the Pharisees accuse his disciples of violating Jewish law, Jesus responds, "Hear and understand: not what goes into the mouth defiles a man, but what comes out of the mouth, this defiles a man" (Matthew 15:10-11).

[7] Pharisee member of an ancient Jewish sect, represented in the New Testament as strictly observant of Jewish law and with a firm belief in its members' superior holiness and righteousness; a byword for religious hypocrisy in the period; vaunts boasts, brags.

[8] capons castrated cockerels (male chickens), bred for the table, a delicacy.

[9] And so ... be lean In Genesis 41:14-36, Joseph interprets the Egyptian Pharaoh's prescient dream, wherein the Pharaoh sees seven fat and healthy cows devoured by seven gaunt and starving cows, yet the latter seven remain gaunt and starving even after their huge meal. Joseph accurately interprets the seven fat cows as representing seven years of abundant harvests in Egypt, and the seven gaunt cows as representing seven succeeding years of terrible famine.

[10] Latin, "On Geron" ("gerontem" means "old man").

[11] Raphael Holinshed (c. 1525-80), editor, compiler, and author of the enormously popular and influential Chronicles of England, Scotland and Ireland (1578; see pp. 513-26), a prime historical source for writers of the period.

[12] fourscore eighty.

[13] odd single, sole.

[14] accident incident, occurrence.

[15] The town of Boulogne (France) was besieged and taken by Henry VIII in 1544 (Topographical Dict., p. 70); the plaguy sweat Davies may refer to either of the two major outbreaks of the plague in London in this period: 1563 or 1593.

[16] Saint Quintine's At Saint Quentin's, a town in France on the Somme, the Spanish fought and were victorious over the French; English soldiers aided the Spanish (Topographical Dict., p. 475); New Haven a village in Scotland on the Firth of Forth, with a nearby harbour; it was the scene of Sir William Winter's 1560 blockade of the Firth of Forth, part of English attempts to stop the French from aiding Mary of Guise. This blockade was instrumental in ending English-French hostilities in Scotland (Topographical Dict., p. 365; D. Loades, "Sir William Winter," DNB online, 2006).

The Rising in the North, the frost so great[1]
That cartwheel-prints on Thames's face were graven,

The fall of money and burning of Paul's steeple,[2]
The blazing star and Spaniards' overthrow—[3]
By these events, notorious to the people,
He measures times, and things forepast doth show.

But most of all he chiefly reckons by
A private chance, the death of his cursed[4] wife;
This is to him the dearest memory
And th'happiest accident of all his life.

In Ciprium (Epigram 22)

The fine youth Ciprius is more terse[5] and neat
Than the new garden of the Old Temple[6] is,
And still the newest fashion he doth get,
And with the time doth change from that to this.
He wears a hat now of the flat crown block,[7]
The treble ruffs,[8] long cloak, and doublet French;
He takes tobacco and doth wear a lock,[9]
And wastes more time in dressing than a wench.
Yet this new-fangled youth, made for these times,
Doth above all praise old Gascoigne's[10] rhymes.

In Haywodum (Epigram 29)[11]

Heywood, which did in epigrams excel,
Is now put down since my light[12] muse arose,
As buckets are put down into a well,
Or as a schoolboy putteth down his hose.[13]

In Dacum (Epigram 30)

Amongst the poets Dacus[14] numbered is,
Yet could he never make an English rhyme;
But some prose speeches I have heard of his,
Which have been spoken many a hundred time.
The man that keeps the elephant hath one,[15]
Wherein he tells the wonders of the beast.
Another Banks pronounced long agone,

---

1 The Rising in the North i.e., the Northern Rebellion (1569-70), triggered by the proposed marriage between the English peer Thomas Howard, duke of Norfolk and Mary, queen of Scots. When Norfolk was arrested and imprisoned for his treason, his supporters, the earls of Northumberland and Westmorland, raised an army in the north of England. With little popular support and the arrival of royal forces, the rebellion crumbled (D.J. Lamburn, "The Northern Rebellion," Hist. Dict. Tudor England, pp. 351-52); the frost so great The Thames froze over in 1565, an extremely unusual and highly memorable event (L. Picard, Elizabeth's London [London, 2003], p. 279).

2 fall of money In 1560, Elizabeth I attempted to address the economic consequences of her predecessors' debasement of the coinage, by recalling and re-coining all of England's gold and silver currency. This action was so politically sensitive that the government subsequently proclaimed that "no man should dare to speak of [the] falling of money but they should be put in prison three months and after had to the pillory" (Picard, Elizabeth's London, p. 256); burning of Paul's Steeple A fire destroyed the steeple of St Paul's Cathedral (London) in 1561 (Topographical Dict., p. 395).

3 the blazing star probably a reference to the supernova that appeared in November 1572, about which much was written (R.J. Roberts, "John Dee," DNB online, 2006); the Spaniards' overthrow the defeat of the Spanish Armada, intent on invading England in 1588.

4 cursed shrewish, bad-tempered.

5 terse spruce, well-dressed.

6 Old Temple one of the first buildings constructed on a piece of land known as "the Temple" (between Fleet Street and the Thames), joined later by the other Inns of Court. The gardens lying between the buildings and the Thames were famous for their beauty (Topographical Dict., pp. 503-04).

7 block shape, style, fashion.

8 ruff an elaborate article of neckwear, usually consisting of starched linen or muslin arranged in horizontal flutings, and standing out all around the neck. French fashions had long been a by-word for extravagance, vanity, and "softness" unbecoming of men. Cf. Jonson's "On the English Monsieur."

9 lock i.e., a lovelock, a lock of hair worn longer than the rest and arranged so as to hang forward over one shoulder, often tied with a ribbon (popular among late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century courtiers).

10 George Gascoigne (?1534/35-77), poet, playwright, and fiction writer, whose works came to be seen as increasingly old-fashioned. See pp. 339-76.

11 Latin, "On Heywood." John Heywood (?1497-?1580) was a playwright and author of several books of proverbs and epigrams, published between 1550 and 1562. See The Proverbs and Epigrams of John Heywood, reprint of 1562 edition (New York, 1967).

12 light active, nimble.

13 hose stockings. Putting down his hose was the student's traditional preparation for corporal punishment at the hands of his schoolmaster. See R.W. Bushnell, A Culture of Teaching (Ithaca, 1996), pp. 23-30.

14 Dacus poet and dramatist Samuel Daniel (1562/63-1619).

15 On the elephant, see "In Titum," p. 1139, note 3.

When he his curtal's qualities expressed.[1]
He first taught him that keeps the monuments
At Westminster his formal tale to say,[2]
And also him which puppets represents,[3]
And also him which with the ape doth play.[4]
Though all his poetry be like to this,
Amongst the poets Dacus numbered is.

Of Tobacco (Epigram 36)

Homer of moly and nepenthe sings:
Moly, the gods' most sovereign[5] herb divine,
Nepenthe,[6] Heaven's[7] drink which gladness brings,
Heart's grief expels, and doth the wits refine.

But this our age another world hath found
From whence an herb of heavenly power is brought;[8]
Moly is not so sovereign[9] for a wound,
Nor hath nepenthe so great wonders wrought.

It is tobacco, whose sweet substantial[10] fume
The hellish torment of the teeth doth ease,
By drawing down and drying up the rheum,
The mother and the nurse of each disease.[11]

It is tobacco which doth cold expel,
And clears the obstructions of the arteries,
And surfeits threat'ning death digesteth well,[12]
Decocting all the stomach's crudities.[13]

It is tobacco which hath power to clarify
The cloudy mists before dim eyes appearing;[14]
It is tobacco which hath power to rarefy
The thick, gross humour which doth stop the hearing,[15]

The wasting hectic and the quartan fever[16]
Which doth of physic[17] make a mockery;
The gout[18] it cures, and helps ill breaths forever,
Whether the cause in tooth or stomach be.

And though ill breaths were by it but confounded,[19]
Yet that medicine it doth far excel

---

[1] Another Banks ... expressed William (Richard) Banks (fl. 1591-1637) was a famous popular entertainer, renowned for his dancing horse, Morocco, who was reputed to perform arithmetic calculations (A. Freeman, Elizabeth's Misfits [New York, 1978], pp. 123-75; and E. Griffith, "William [Richard] Banks," DNB online, 2006); curtal horse with its tail cut short and docked, and sometimes with its ears cropped.

[2] In "Satire IV," Donne says this individual "keeps the Abbey tombs, / And for his price doth with whoever comes, / Of all our Harrys, and our Edwards talk, / From king to king and all their kin can walk: / Your ears shall hear naught, but kings ..." (ll. 75-79).

[3] represents exhibits, presents.

[4] Like the elephant, the ape was an exotic side-show attraction for visitors to Westminster Abbey. It is also mentioned in Donne's "Satire I," l.81.

[5] sovereign supreme, excellent.

[6] Moly fabled herb with magic properties, said by Homer to have been given by Hermes to Odysseus (Ulysses) as a charm against the sorceries of Circe; Nepenthe an Egyptian drug capable of banishing grief or trouble from the mind (see Odyssey, book 4).

[7] Heaven's while the 1st edition has "heavens," later editions have "Hekens." Grosart notes that "Helens" is also a possible emendation (2.32-33, note 8).

[8] But this our age another world hath found ... brought a reference to the European discovery of tobacco in the Americas. It was first brought back to England by the explorer Sir John Hawkins in 1565. It grew in popularity throughout the seventeenth-century.

[9] sovereign efficacious.

[10] substantial In the MS, "substantial" is "subtle" (Grosart, ed., Complete Poems, 2.33, note 2).

[11] The hellish torment ... By drawing down ...each disease Abnormal rheums—watery matter secreted by mucus glands or membranes—were thought to be the origin of many diseases, such as the tooth-ache.

[12] It was thought that a "surfeit" (the action and result of gluttonous eating and/or drinking) could lead to serious illness or derangement of a person's bodily systems.

[13] Tobacco, Davies suggests, aides in "decocting" (refining, purifying, or indeed digesting) the "crudities" (the imperfectly concocted humours) of the stomach.

[14] cloudy mists before dim eyes appearing the result of disorders of the eyes, such as cataracts.

[15] power to rarefy ... stop the hearing Tobacco can also "rarefy" (thin or lessen the density of) the thick humoural liquid which results in hearing impairment. Cf. Baldwin, Beware the Cat, p. 258, note 5.

[16] hectic a fever that accompanies wasting diseases, such as consumption, and leaves the skin flushed, hot, and dry; quartan fever a type of fever characterized by convulsions that occur every four days.

[17] physic medical knowledge and practice, as well as medicines.

[18] gout painful inflammatory disease that attacks the smaller joints.

[19] confounded abashed, put to shame (here, used fig., to mean "marginally aided").

Which by Sir Thomas More hath been propounded,[1]
For this is thought a gentlemanlike smell.

Oh, that I were one of these mountebanks[2]
Which praise their oils and powders which they sell!
My customers would give me coin with thanks,
I for this ware so smooth a tale would tell.

Yet would I use none of those terms before;
I would but say that it the pox[3] will cure.
This were enough, without discoursing more,
All our brave gallants in the town t'allure.

In Philonem (Epigram 38)[4]

Philo the gentleman, the fortune teller,
The schoolmaster, the midwife and the bawd,[5]
The conjurer, the buyer and the seller
Of painting[6] which with breathing will be thawed,

Doth practice physic, and his credit[7] grows
As doth the ballad-singer's auditory,
Which hath at Temple Bar[8] his standing chose,
And to the vulgar sings an ale-house story.[9]

First stands a porter, then an oyster-wife[10]
Doth stint her cry and stay her steps to hear him,
Then comes a cutpurse[11] ready with his knife,
And then a country client[12] presseth near him.

There stands the constable, there stands the whore,
And hark'ning to the song mark not[13] each other.
There by the sergeant[14] stands the debtor poor,
And doth no more mistrust him than his brother.
Thus Orpheus[15] to such hearers giveth music,
And Philo to such patients giveth physic.

Meditations of a Gull (Epigram 47)

See yonder melancholy gentleman,
Which, hoodwinked with his hat, alone doth sit!
Think what he thinks, and tell me if you can
What great affairs troubles his little wit.

He thinks not of the war 'twixt France and Spain,[16]
Whether it be for Europe's good or ill,

---

[1] In his Epigrammata (Thomae Mori Latina Opera [Louvanii, 1566]), More has a brief poem about bad breath, Medicinae ad tollendos foetores anhelitus provenientes a cibis quibusdam ("Remedies for ending the foul breath which results from certain foods"). He suggests jestingly that a person who has eaten a strong-smelling food should eat in sequence those even more foul (leeks, then onions, then garlic), until finally (if the garlic does no good) he should eat excrement. See Epigram 238, trans. and ed., L. Bradner and C.A. Lynch, The Latin Epigrams of Thomas More (Chicago, 1953), pp. 223-24.

[2] mountebank an itinerant quack, who from a makeshift stage appealed to his audience by means of stories, tricks, songs, etc.

[3] pox sexually transmitted infection.

[4] Latin, "On Philo" ("philo" means "lover").

[5] bawd pimp, procurer.

[6] painting cosmetics.

[7] credit reputation.

[8] Temple Bar the name of the barrier or gateway closing the entrance into the city of London from the Strand.

[9] The ale-house was the most informal and disreputable drinking establishment in the period; often simply a room in the host's house, it had a reputation for encouraging the drunkenness, sexual licentiousness, and riotous behaviour of the labouring poor. See J. Friedman, The Battle of the Frogs and Fairford's Flies (New York, 1993), pp. 159-61.

[10] oyster-wife a woman or girl who sold oysters; her "cry" was a notoriously loud and piercing invitation to buy her wares.

[11] cutpurse one who steals purses by cutting the cord that fastened them to their owners' belts.

[12] country client People who came from the countryside to London to deal with legal matters are conventionally represented as naive and overwhelmed by "the big city"; they are thus the cutpurse's and pickpocket's favourite target.

[13] mark not do not notice or pay close attention to.

[14] sergeant here, an officer of the court who was responsible for arresting offenders and issuing summonses.

[15] Orpheus legendary singer and musician, son of the muse Calliope (muse of heroic epic) and Apollo (god of poetry). Given a lute by Apollo himself, Orpheus' music could quiet wild beasts and cause inanimate objects like rocks and trees to move (Ovid, Metamorphoses, 11.1-67).

[16] the war 'twixt France and Spain Henry IV of France declared war on Spain in January 1595, and although the English sided with the French and provided some 2,000 men, the war was quickly concluded in May 1598 when Henry made peace with Spain (Tudor England, p. 345).

Nor whether the Empire can itself maintain
Against the Turkish power encroaching still;[1]

Nor what great town in all the Netherlands,
The States determine to besiege this spring;[2]
Nor how the Scottish policy now stands,
Nor what becomes of th'Irish mutining.[3]

But he doth seriously bethink him whether
Of the gulled people he be more esteemed
For his long cloak or for his great black feather,
By which each gull is now a gallant deemed;

Or of a journey he deliberates
To Paris-garden, cock-pit or the play;[4]
Or how to steal a dog he meditates,
Or what he shall unto his mistress say:
Yet with these thoughts he thinks himself most fit
To be of counsel with a king for wit.

Ad Musam (Epigram 48)[5]

Peace, idle Muse, have done! for it is time,
Since lousy Ponticus[6] envies my fame,
And swears the better sort are much to blame
To make me so well known for so ill rhyme:

Yet Banks his horse is better known than he,[7]
So are the camels and the western hog,[8]
And so is Lepidus[9] his printed dog:
Why doth not Ponticus their fames envy?

Besides, this Muse of mine and the black feather
Grew both together fresh in estimation,
And both grown stale were cast away together.
What fame is this that scarce last out a fashion?

Only this last in credit doth remain,
That from henceforth each bastard cast-forth rhyme,
Which doth but savour of a libel vain,
Shall call me father, and be thought my crime;
So dull, and with so little sense endued
Is my gross-headed judge, the multitude.

Ignoto[10]

[I love thee not for sacred chastity]

I love thee not for sacred chastity,
Who loves for that? Nor for thy sprightly wit.
I love thee not for thy sweet modesty,
Which makes thee in perfection's throne to sit.

I love thee not for thy enchanting eye,
Thy beauty ravishing perfection.
I love thee not for unchaste luxury,
Nor for thy body's fair proportion.

---

1 Nor whether ... encroaching still a reference to the long series of military invasions and victories by the Ottoman Turks at the expense of the Holy Roman Empire, beginning with the taking of Constantinople in 1453; Vienna was besieged in 1529 and Cyprus in 1571 (D.J. Vitkus, Introduction, Three Turk Plays from Early Modern England [New York, 2000], p. 7).

2 Nor what ... spring The "States" refers to the parliament of the Netherlands, but perhaps more narrowly to those in charge of government affairs in the United Netherlands; from 1567 to 1609, the Protestant Netherlands were in revolt against their Spanish overlords, spurred by the Catholic Philip II's policy of political centralization and religious persecution.

3 th'Irish mutining In 1594 the Nine Years War began under the leadership of Hugh O'Neill, who, with the collusion of the Spanish, almost succeeded in driving the English out of Ireland. (A. Hadfield and W. Maley, Introduction, A View of the State of Ireland by Edmund Spenser [1633], ed. A. Hadfield and W. Maley [Oxford, 1997], p. xiv).

4 Paris-garden a bear garden, a place for the blood sport of bear-baiting, where a bear would be tied to a stake and dogs set upon it; cock-pit a pit or enclosed area for cock-fighting; play theatre.

5 Latin, "To the Muse."

6 Ponticus (if he represents an actual individual at all) has remained unidentified.

7 On Banks and his horse, see p. 1141, note 1.

8 Clearly, the camels were another sideshow attraction in London (see p. 1139, note 3 and p. 1141, note 4); the western hog A 1562 ballad describes a monstrous pig born in Hampstead, a small village about five miles NW of St Paul's, London. Such deformed creatures were often displayed at fairs and markets, some bodies even being preserved after death for this purpose (D. Cressy, Agnes Bowker's Cat [Oxford, 2000], pp. 45-46). A 1571 ballad describes a deformed swine, born in Denmark but "brought over by an Englishman," and advertises its display ("A mervaylous straunge deformed Swyne," STC 19071).

9 Lepidus is Sir John Harington (1560-1612), translator of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1591). The "printed dog" is Harington's favourite dog, Bungey, so-called because an engraving of him appears on the translation's 1st edition title page (Grosart, ed., Complete Poems, 2.44-45, note l).

10 Latin, "the unknown." Given the sexually explicit nature of two of these three sonnets, it is no wonder that they appear with this authorial disclaimer. There has been some debate, however, over whether or not they are actually by Davies.

I love thee not for that my soul doth dance
And leap with pleasure when those lips of thine
Give musical and graceful utterance
To some (by thee made happy) poet's line.
I love thee not for voice or slender small,
But wilt thou know wherefore? Fair sweet, for all.

[Faith (wench) I cannot court thy sprightly eyes]

Faith (wench) I cannot court thy sprightly eyes,
With the bass viol placed between my thighs,
I cannot lisp nor to some fiddle sing,
Nor run upon a high-stretched minikin.[1]
I cannot whine in puling[2] elegies,
Entombing Cupid with sad obsequies;
I am not fashioned for these amorous times,
To court thy beauty with lascivious rhymes.
I cannot dally, caper, dance, and sing,
Oiling[3] my saint with supple sonneting.
I cannot cross my arms or sigh "Ay me,
Ay me, forlorn": Egregious foppery!
I cannot buss thy fist,[4] play with thy hair,
Swearing by Jove thou art most debonaire:
  Not I, by cock![5] But shall I tell thee roundly,
  Hark in thine ear, Zounds I can ( )[6] thee soundly.

[Sweet wench, I love thee, yet I will not sue]

Sweet wench, I love thee, yet I will not sue,
Or show my love as musky[7] courtiers do;
I'll not carouse a health[8] to honour thee,
In this same bezzling[9] drunken courtesy,
And when all's quaffed, eat up my bousing[10] glass,
In glory that I am thy servile ass.
Nor will I wear a rotten Burbon lock,[11]
As some sworn peasant to a female smock.
Well-featured lass, thou knowest I love thee dear,
Yet for thy sake I will not bore mine ear
To hang thy dirty silken shoe-tires[12] there.
Nor for thy love will I once gnash a brick,[13]
Or some pied colours in my bonnet stick:
  But by the chaps[14] of hell to do thee good,
  I'll freely spend my thrice-decocted blood.[15]

—1595?

from Gulling Sonnets[16]

To His Good Friend, Sir Anthony Cooke.[17]

Here my chameleon Muse herself doth change
To divers shapes of gross absurdities,
And like an antic mocks with fashion strange
The fond admirers of lewd gulleries.
Your judgment sees with pity and with scorn
The bastard sonnets of these rhymers base,
Which in this whisking age are daily born

---

1 minikin the treble string of a lute or viol.

2 puling complaining, whimpering.

3 Oiling flattering.

4 buss kiss; fist hand. C. Howard's facsimile edition of Davies's poems (New York, 1941, p. 60) based on the Huntington Library 1st edition clearly has "fist" here, but the 1st edition in the "Early English Books Online" series has "fill."

5 by cock version of the oath, "By God."

6 Zounds euphemistic abbreviation of the oath "God's wounds"; ( ) In the 1st edition, the obvious four-letter obscenity—fuck—is replaced by this ellipsis.

7 musky perfumed.

8 carouse a health drink deeply in the manner of a toast.

9 bezzling guzzling.

10 bousing boozing.

11 Burbon lock A fashionable courtier would grow a lock of his hair longer than the rest, tie it with a ribbon, and let in hang in front of his shoulder, signifying he was in love; here, the particular fashion was a French one.

12 shoe-tires shoe-ties, shoe-strings.

13 gnash a brick probably a printer's error for the expression "wash a brick," referring to an impossible, futile and/or useless endeavour (Erasmus, Adages, I.iv.48: Laterem lavas, "You are washing a brick").

14 chaps jaws, mouth.

15 thrice-decocted blood semen, which was believed to be made from super-refined blood.

16 These satiric sonnets were not published during Davies's lifetime; gulling that which deceives; cheating, deceptive.

17 Sir Anthony Cooke (d. 1604), grandson of the famous educator and humanist of the same name, was knighted for his service at Cadiz in 1596. Thus, critics assume that the "Gulling Sonnets" were composed between 1596 and 1604; the poems themselves, however, offer few details that would help us date them (Sanderson, Sir John Davies, p. 50).

To their own shames and poetry's disgrace.
Yet some praise those and some perhaps will praise
Even these of mine: and therefore these I send
To you that pass in court your glorious days;
That if some rich, rash gull these rhymes commend,
Thus you may set this formal wit to school,
Use your own grace, and beg him for a fool.

2

As when the bright cerulean firmament[1]
Hath not his glory with black clouds defast,[2]
So were my thoughts void of all discontent
And with no mist of passions overcast.
They all were pure and clear, till at the last
An idle, careless thought forth wand'ring went,
And of that poisonous beauty took a taste
Which does the hearts of lovers so torment.
Then as it chanceth in a flock of sheep
When some contagious ill breeds first in one,
Daily it spreads, and secretly doth creep
Till all the silly[3] troop be overgone,
So by close neighbourhood within my breast
One scurvy[4] thought infecteth all the rest.

3

What eagle can behold her sunbright eye,[5]
Her sunbright eye that lights the world with love,
The world of love wherein I live and die,
I live and die and divers changes prove;
I changes prove, yet still the same am I,
The same am I and never will remove,
Never remove until my soul doth fly,
My soul doth fly and I surcease to move;
I cease to move which now am moved by you,
Am moved by you that move all mortal hearts,
All mortal hearts whose eyes your eyes doth view
Your eyes doth view whence Cupid shoots his darts,
Whence Cupid shoots his darts and woundeth those
That honour you, and never were his foes.

6

The sacred Muse that first made love divine
Hath made him naked and without attire;
But I will clothe him with this pen of mine
That all the world his fashion shall admire:
His hat of hope, his band[6] of beauty fine,
His cloak of craft, his doublet[7] of desire;
Grief for a girdle[8] shall about him twine;
His points of pride, his ilet-holes[9] of ire,
His hose of hate, his codpiece[10] of conceit,
His stockings of stern strife, his shirt of shame;
His garters of vain-glory, gay and slight,
His pantofles[11] of passions I will frame;
Pumps[12] of presumption shall adorn his feet,
And socks[13] of sullenness exceeding sweet.

8

My case is this: I love Zepheria[14] bright.
Of her I hold my heart by fealty[15]

---

1 cerulean firmament sky-blue heavens.

2 defast defaced.

3 silly innocent; helpless.

4 scurvy diseased; worthless, contemptible.

5 The eagle was believed able to look directly into the sun (Pliny, Natural History, 1.272k). See Shakespeare's "Sonnet 130" for a similarly satiric use of the commonplace comparison of the beloved's eyes to the sun.

6 band collar.

7 craft deceit, guile; doublet a close-fitting body garment, worn by men from the fourteenth to the eighteenth centuries.

8 girdle belt worn around the waist to secure one's garments; a method of carrying light articles (especially a purse or weapon).

9 points tagged laces or cords, used to attach a man's hose to his doublet; ilet-holes the holes through which laces and points would be threaded (like button-holes today).

10 codpiece a bagged appendage on the front of a man's hose or breeches, covering his genitals, often conspicuous and elaborately ornamented; worn from the fifteenth to the seventeenth centuries ("cod" means "scrotum").

11 pantofles slippers, indoor shoes.

12 Pumps light shoes; the soft-soled variety were often used for dancing (L. Picard, Elizabeth's London, p. 139).

13 socks light shoes, slippers, or pumps, but perhaps simply "socks" in the modern sense.

14 "Zepheria" is the title of an anonymously authored sonnet sequence published in 1594. Davies alludes to it here because of the large number of its sonnets that employ legal language and imagery (such as 5, 6, 20, 21, 37, and 38). For other love poems that employ legal conceits, see Drayton, Idea, "Sonnet 2"; and Shakespeare's Sonnets 87 and 134 (L.M. Storozynsky, "Zepheria," DLB 172, p. 251).

15 fealty the obligation of fidelity on the part of a vassal to his lord.

Which I discharge[1] to her perpetually,
Yet she thereof will never me accquite.[2]
For now supposing I withhold her right,[3]
She hath distrained[4] my heart to satisfy
The duty which I never did deny,
And far away impounds it with despite.
I labour therefore justly to repleve[5]
My heart which she unjustly doth impound,
But quick conceit which now is love's high shrieve[6]
Returns it as esloigned,[7] not to be found;
Then, which the law affords, I only crave
Her heart for mine in withernam[8] to have.

—composed, c. 1594-1604

from Nosce Teipsum.[9] This Oracle Expounded in Two Elegies.

1. Of Human Knowledge.
2. Of the Soul of Man, and the Immortality Thereof.

To My Most Gracious Dread Sovereign

To that clear majesty which, in the north,
Doth like another sun in glory rise,
Which standeth fixed yet spreads her heavenly worth,
Loadstone to hearts and loadstar[10] to all eyes,

Like Heav'n in all, like th' earth in this alone,
That though great states by her support do stand,
Yet she herself supported is of none
But by the finger of th' Almighty's hand,

[...]

I offer up some sparkles of that fire
Whereby we reason, live, and move, and be.[11]
These sparks by nature evermore aspire,
Which makes them to so high a Highness flee.

Fair soul, since to the fairest body knit
You give such lively life, such quick'ning[12] power,
Such sweet, celestial influence to it
As keeps it still in youth's immortal flower,

(As where the sun is present all the year
And never doth retire his golden ray
Needs[13] must the spring be everlasting there,
And every season like the month of May,

Oh, many, many years may you remain
A happy angel to this happy land!
Long, long may you on earth our Empress reign
Ere[14] you in Heaven a glorious angel stand.

---

[1] discharge fulfil, execute, perform.

[2] accquite acquit: release, liberate (a person of or from a duty or obligation).

[3] I withhold her right i.e., I refuse to fulfill those obligations or perform those duties to which she has a legal right.

[4] distrained In a legal sense, "to distrain" means to constrain or force someone to perform an obligation, by seizing the person's property.

[5] repleve replevy: to bail out, to have restored (to one) property that has been distrained, upon the owner's giving security that he will have the matter tried in a court of justice and (if the case goes against him) to return the property to one who had originally seized it.

[6] quick conceit lively thought, wit or ability to conceive; shrieve a shrive or sheriff, a civil officer whose duties would have included executing writs (such as those for replevin).

[7] esloigned conveyed or removed out of the jurisdiction of the court or the sheriff.

[8] withernam In an action of replevin, the reprisal of other goods in lieu of those taken by a first distress and esloigned.

[9] Latin, Nosce te ipsum, or "Know thyself." This famous motto was inscribed on the temple of Apollo at Delphi and was later included in Cicero's Tusculan Disputations, i. 52. In Protagoras, Plato says it is an expression of the legendary Seven Wise Men (343).

[10] Loadstone literally a magnet, and thus fig., something that attracts and guides; loadstar fig., a "guiding star," that on which one's attention or hopes are fixed.

[11] Whereby ... and be During one of St Paul's proselytizing speeches in Athens, he quotes from a Greek poet, sometimes identified as Epimenides: "Yet he [i.e., God] is not far from each one of us, for 'In him we live and move and have our being'" (Acts 17:28).

[12] quick'ning quickening: life-giving, vivifying.

[13] Needs of necessity.

[14] Ere before.

Stay long, sweet spirit, ere thou to Heaven depart,
Which mak'st each place a heaven wherein thou art.

Her Majesty's least and unworthiest subject,
John Davies.

Of Human Knowledge[1]

Why did my parents send me to the schools
That I with knowledge might enrich my mind?
Since the desire to know first made men fools,
And did corrupt the root of all mankind.

For when God's hand had written in the hearts
Of the first parents[2] all the rules of good,
So that their skill infused did pass all arts
That ever were, before or since the Flood;[3]

And when their reason's eye was sharp and clear,
And (as an eagle can behold the sun)[4]
Could have approached the Eternal Light as near
As th' intellectual angels could have done;

Even then to them the Spirit of Lies[5] suggests
That they were blind because they saw not ill,
And breathes into their incorrupted[6] breasts
A curious wish, which did corrupt their will.

For that same ill they straight desired to know:
Which ill, being nought but a defect of good,[7]
In all God's works the Devil could not show,
While man their lord in his perfection stood.

So that themselves were first to do the ill,
Ere they thereof the knowledge could attain,
Like him that knew not poison's power to kill,
Until by tasting it himself was slain.

Even so by tasting of that fruit forbid,
Where they sought knowledge, they did error find:
Ill they desired to know, and ill they did,
And to give passion eyes made reason blind.

For then their minds did first in passion see
Those wretched shapes of misery and woe,
Of nakedness, of shame, of poverty,
Which then their own experience made them know.

But then grew reason dark, that she no more
Could the fair forms of good and truth discern:
Bats they became that eagles[8] were before,
And this they got by their desire to learn.

But we their wretched offspring, what do we?
Do not we still taste of the fruit forbid
Whiles with fond fruitless curiosity,
In books profane we seek for knowledge hid?

What is this knowledge but the sky-stol'n fire
For which the thief[9] still chained in ice doth sit?

---

[1] This first section of Davies's philosophic poem occupies approximately one-tenth of its entire length (180 of 1,924 lines).

[2] first parents Adam and Eve. Lines 1-36 offer an interpretation of Genesis 1-3. God places Adam and Eve, the first humans, in the garden of Eden, with a single injunction: do not eat from the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil, because if they do they "shalt surely die" (2:17). Seduced by the serpent's (the Devil's) assertion that if they eat of the tree, they will "be as gods, knowing both good and evil" and by her desire for wisdom, Eve eats, as does Adam; they fall into sin, mutability, and death. The linking of this sin of disobedience with the desire for knowledge can be found in numerous Renaissance texts, such as Aemilia Lanyer's Salve Deus Rex Judaeorum (1611).

[3] the Flood Genesis 6:5-8:22 recounts the great flood that God visits upon humanity, wherein all creation perishes with the exception of Noah, his family, and the animals which they take with them in their ark.

[4] Eagles were popularly believed able to look directly into the sun without being blinded (Pliny, Natural History, 272k).

[5] the Spirit of Lies the Devil, Satan.

[6] incorrupted uncorrupted.

[7] Although the 1st edition has "God," given the context this is clearly a printer's error for "good."

[8] Bats were traditionally thought blind. On eagles, see p. 1147, note 4.

[9] the thief Prometheus. Condemned by Zeus (Jupiter/Jove) for the crime of stealing fire from Heaven to give to suffering mankind, Prometheus was chained on the top of Mount Caucasus (hence, the ice). There, a vulture devoured his liver, which was miraculously restored each day. In another story, Prometheus' theft of fire from the chariot of the sun allowed him to bring to life the first man and woman, whom he had fashioned out of clay (See Bibliotheca, attributed to Apollodorus of Athens [c. 180-c. 110 BCE]).

And which the poor rude satyr[1] did admire,
And needs would kiss but burnt his lips with it?

What is it but the cloud empty of rain
Which when Jove's guest[2] embraced, he monsters got?
Or the false pails which, oft being filled with pain,
Received the water but retained it not?[3]

Shortly, what is it but the fiery coach
Which the youth sought, and sought his death withal?[4]
Or the boy's wings which, when he did approach
The sun's hot beams, did melt and let him fall?[5]

And yet, alas, when all our lamps are burned,
Our bodies wasted and our spirits spent,
When we have all the learned volumes turned
Which yield men's wits both help and ornament,

What can we know or what can we discern
When error chokes the windows of the mind?
The divers forms of things how can we learn,
That have been ever from our birthday blind?

When reason's lamp, which like the sun in sky
Throughout man's little world[6] her beams did spread,
Is now become a sparkle, which doth lie
Under the ashes, half extinct and dead,

How can we hope that through the eye and ear
This dying sparkle in this cloudy place
Can recollect these beams of knowledge clear
Which were infused in the first minds by grace?

So might the heir, whose father hath in play[7]
Wasted a thousand pounds of ancient rent,
By painful earning of a groat[8] a day
Hope to restore the patrimony spent.

The wits that dived most deep and soared most high,
Seeking man's powers, have found his weakness such:
"Skill comes so slow, and life so fast doth fly,
We learn so little and forget so much."[9]

For this the wisest of all mortal men
Said "he knew nought but that he nought did know":[10]

---

[1] poor rude satyr In an addition to the ancient myth, a satyr, inspired by the beauty of the fire Prometheus brings from Heaven, kisses it and burns his lips. The exact origin of this addition is unclear, but it does turn up in Lyly's Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (edited by L. Scragg [Manchester, 2003], p. 191) and Sidney's Certain Sonnets, where Sidney replies to a poem on this subject by his friend and fellow-poet, Edward Dyer.

[2] Jove's guest Ixion, king of Thessaly, who fell in love with Jove's wife, Juno, and attempted to seduce her. Jove forestalled this attempt by substituting a cloud shaped in the image of his wife. Making love to the cloud-shaped image of Juno, Ixion begot the race of the Centaurs, creatures half-human and half-horse. Jove punished Ixion by striking him with lightning and then pinning him on an ever-revolving wheel in Hades, the classical version of Hell. In the Middle Ages and Renaissance, Ixion became an emblem of the deadly sins of pride, lust, and greed.

[3] Or the false pails ... not referring to punishment of the Danaides. They were the fifty daughters of Danaus, to whom Danaus' brother, Aegyptus, wanted to marry his fifty sons. A reluctant Danaus agreed to the marriages, but secretly arranged with his daughters that they would kill their new husbands on their joint wedding night. Only one of the fifty daughters did not murder her husband. Later additions to the story have the Danaides condemned to Hades, where they are forced eternally to fill leaky vessels with water.

[4] The "youth" is Phaethon, son of Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun, and Clymene, a sea-nymph. In search of confirmation of his paternity, Phaethon visits Apollo, who reluctantly fulfills a rash promise to the boy, allowing him to drive the chariot of the sun. Unable to control the fiery horses, Phaethon is destroyed by Zeus who fears that the careening sun-chariot will consume both heaven and earth. Renaissance commentators saw Phaethon's story as a warning against pride and over-confidence.

[5] The "boy" is Icarus, who was given a pair of wings by his father, the great artificer Daedalus, so that they could escape from their imprisonment in Crete. Icarus, disobeying his father's injunction to fly midway between the ocean and the heavens, soared too close to the sun; the wax holding his wings together melted, and he fell into the ocean and was drowned. Renaissance commentators saw his story as a warning against disobedience, pride, and ambition.

[6] man's little world Man was popularly conceived as a microcosm (a "little world") that reflects the macrocosm (or universe).

[7] in play by gambling.

[8] groat a coin that came to be recognized as the "type" of a very small sum.

[9] Proverb, "Art is long, life is short" (Tilley A332).

[10] The saying is ascribed to Socrates in Plato's Apology, 21-22.

And the great mocking-master mocked not then,
When he said, "truth was buried deep below."[1]

For how may we to other things attain
When none of us his own soul understands?
For which the Devil mocks our curious brain
When "know thyself" his oracle commands.[2]

For why should we the busy soul believe
When boldly she concludes of that and this,
When of herself she can no judgment give,
Nor how, nor whence, nor where, nor what she is?

All things without, which round about we see,
We seek to know and have therewith to do;
But that whereby we "reason, live, and be,"
Within ourselves, we strangers are thereto.

We seek to know the moving of each sphere,[3]
And the strange cause of th' ebbs and floods of Nile;
But of that clock which in our breasts we bear,
The subtle motions we forget the while.

We that acquaint ourselves with every zone[4]
And pass both tropics and behold both poles,
When we come home are to ourselves unknown,
And unacquainted still with our own souls.

We study speech, but others we persuade;
We leechcraft[5] learn, but others cure with it;
W' interpret laws, which other men have made,
But read not those which in our hearts are writ.

Is it because the mind is like the eye,
Through which it gathers knowledge by degrees,
Whose rays reflect not, but spread outwardly,
Not seeing itself when other things it sees?

No, doubtless; for the mind can backward cast
Upon herself her understanding light;
But she is so corrupt, and so defaced,
As her own image doth herself affright.

As in the fable of that lady fair
Which for her lust was turned into a cow,[6]
When thirsty to a stream she did repair
And saw herself transformed (she wist not how),

At first she startles, then she stands amazed,
At last with terror she from thence doth fly;
And loathes the watery glass wherein she gazed,
And shuns it still though she for thirst do die:

Even so man's soul which did God's image bear,
And was at first fair, good, and spotless pure,
Since with her sins her beauties blotted were,
Doth of all sights her own sight least endure:

For even at first reflection she espies
Such strange chimeras[7] and such monsters there,
Such toys, such antics,[8] and such vanities,
As she retires and shrinks for shame and fear.

---

[1] The "mocking master" is the Greek philosopher Democritus, who reportedly said: "In reality we know nothing; for truth is in the depths." See C.C.W. Taylor, ed. and trans., The Atomists: Leucippus and Democritus: Fragments. A Text and Translation (Toronto, 1999), D15, p. 9. See also Laertius, 2.9.72: "of a truth we know nothing, for truth is in a well (i.e., in an abyss)."

[2] See p. 1146, note 9. It was a common belief in the Renaissance that the oracles of Apollo (as well as the classical gods themselves) were historically agents of the devil.

[3] sphere referring to the Ptolemaic notion of the universe as a series of concentric spheres, set one inside the other with the Earth at its centre. In their motion, these spheres created a harmonious and divine music, the "music of the spheres."

[4] zone each of the five "belts" or encircling regions, distinguished by difference of climate, into which the surface of the earth (and, in ancient cosmography, the celestial sphere) is divided by the tropics (of Cancer and Capricorn) and the polar (Arctic and Antarctic) circles.

[5] leechcraft medicine.

[6] that lady fair … cow Zeus (Jove) first raped Io, daughter of Inachus, and then turned her into a cow in order to conceal her from his suspicious wife, Hera (Juno). Forced to give the transformed Io to Hera as a gift, Zeus finally appeased his wife, ended the torment of the wandering Io, and restored her to human form. Her story, including the description of her horrified reaction to her transformation, can be found in book 1 of Ovid's Metamorphoses.

[7] chimeras grotesque monsters comprised of the parts of various animals.

[8] toys foolish or idle fancies; antics grotesque or ludicrous behaviours.

And as the man loves least at home to be
That hath a sluttish house haunted with sprites,[1]
So she, impatient her own faults to see,
Turns from herself and in strange things delights.

For this, few "know themselves": for merchants broke[2]
View their estate with discontent and pain;
And seas are troubled when they do revoke
Their flowing waves into themselves again.

And while the face of outward things we find
Pleasing and fair, agreeable and sweet,
These things transport and carry out the mind,
That with herself her self can never meet.

Yet if affliction once her wars begin,
And threat the feeble sense with sword and fire,
The mind contracts herself and shrinketh in,
And to herself she gladly doth retire,

As spiders, touched, seek their webs' inmost part;
As bees in storms unto their hives return;
As blood, in danger, gathers to the heart;
As men seek towns when foes the country burn.

If aught can teach us aught, affliction's looks,
Making us look into ourselves so near,
Teach us to "know ourselves" beyond all books,
Or all the learned schools that ever were.

This mistress[3] lately plucked me by the ear,
And many a golden lesson hath me taught;
Hath made my senses quick, and reason clear,
Reformed my will and rectified my thought.

So do the winds and thunders cleanse the air;
So working seas settle and purge the wine;[4]
So lopped and pruned trees do flourish fair;
So doth the fire the drossy[5] gold refine.

Neither Minerva nor the Learned Muse,[6]
Nor rules of art nor precepts of the wise,
Could in my brain those beams of skill infuse
As but the glance of this dame's angry eyes.

She within lists[7] my ranging mind hath brought,
That now beyond myself I list not[8] go:
Myself am centre of my circling thought,
Only myself I study, learn, and know.

I know my body's of so frail a kind
As force without, fevers within, can kill;
I know the heavenly nature of my mind,
But 'tis corrupted both in wit and will.

I know my soul hath power to know all things,
Yet is she blind and ignorant in all;
I know I am one of nature's little kings,
Yet to the least and vilest things am thrall.[9]

I know my life's a pain and but a span,
I know my sense is mocked with every thing:
And, to conclude, I know myself a man,
Which is a proud, and yet a wretched thing.

[...]

—1599

---

[1] sluttish grimy, unclean; sprites spirits. In Renaissance folklore, domestic fairies would help with household chores—such as cleaning, brewing, and baking—in exchange for gifts of food and drink. However, such spirits could also punish those who did not recompense their work or who were simply slovenly housekeepers.

[2] broke bankrupt.

[3] "this mistress" is affliction, and Davies might be referring to any number of setbacks he had suffered by the time of the work's publication in 1599, including, but not limited to, his disbarment in 1598 (see above, p. 1137).

[4] Grosart emends "seas" to "lees," but R. Kreuger's 1975 Oxford edition of Davies's poem leaves it as "seas," noting that people would occasionally use the motion of a ship to ensure that any lees remaining in a container of wine would sink to its bottom (p. 332, l. 158, note).

[5] drossy impure.

[6] Minerva (also known as Athena), goddess of learning, wisdom, and war; the Learned Muse perhaps Urania, muse of astronomy and heavenly matters generally, but given that each of the nine muses was the patron of a particular art or science, any may be meant here.

[7] lists limits, boundaries.

[8] I list not I do not desire; I choose not.

[9] thrall slave.

from Hymns of Astraea, in Acrostic Verse.[1]

Hymn I.
Of Astraea.

E arly before the day doth spring,
L et us awake my Muse, and sing;
I t is no time to slumber,
S o many joys this time doth bring,
A s time will fail to number.

B ut whereto shall we bend our lays?[2]
E ven up to Heaven, again to raise
T he maid, which thence descended
H ath brought again the golden days,[3]
A nd all the world amended.

R udeness[4] itself she doth refine,
E ven like an alchemist[5] divine,
G ross times of iron turning
I nto the purest form of gold:
N ot to corrupt till heaven wax[6] old,
A nd be refin'd with burning.[7]

Hymn II.
To Astraea.

E ternal virgin, goddess true,
L et me presume to sing to you.
I ove, even great Iove[8] hath leisure
S ometimes to hear the vulgar crew,[9]
A nd hears them oft with pleasure.

B lessed Astraea, I in part
E njoy the blessings you impart,
T he peace, the milk and honey,
H umanity, and civil art,
A richer dower than money.

R ight glad am I that now I live,
E ven in these days whereto you give
G reat happiness and glory;
I f after you I should be born,
N o doubt I should my birthday scorn,
A dmiring your sweet story.

Hymn XV.
Of Her Wit.

E ye of that mind most quick and clear,
L ike heav'ns eye, which from his sphere.
I nto all things prieth,
S ees through all things everywhere,
A nd all their natures trieth.

B right image of an angel's wit,
E xceeding sharp, and swift like it,
T hings instantly discerning:
H aving a nature infinite,
A nd yet increased by learning.

---

1 Astraea According to some writers, Astraea is the daughter of Titan, Saturn's brother, and Aurora, goddess of the dawn; according to others, she is the daughter of Zeus and Themis. She is the virgin goddess of justice, who lived on Earth during the so-called golden age. However, the increasing evil and impiety of humankind drove her away into the heavens, although she was the last of the gods to abandon the Earth (Metamorphoses, 1.103-76). Like Diana, Phoebe, and Cynthia, Astraea is a common epithet for Elizabeth I in her character as "the Virgin Queen"; Acrostic verse a poem where the first letter of each line spells out a word when read from top to bottom; from the Middle Ages on, the acrostic word was often the name of the author, a saint, a beloved, or a patron (Encycl. Poetry and Poetics, p. 4). Each of the hymns spells out "Elisabetha Regina" (Latin, "Elizabeth Queen").

2 bend our lays direct our songs.

3 the golden days In classical literature, the golden age was the age of original human and natural perfection, before humanity's fall into a series of increasingly degenerate periods, characterized by violence and impiety: the ages of silver, bronze, and iron.

4 Rudeness lack of culture or refinement; uncouthness.

5 alchemist the practitioner of the chemistry of the Middle Ages and Renaissance, who aimed at transforming base metals into gold; here, the connotations of the word are positive, but more often the alchemist is represented as a charlatan or "conman" in Renaissance writing.

6 wax grow.

7 till heaven wax old … burning a reference to the fate ordained for the world at the end of time in the book of Revelation.

8 Iove i.e., Jove, king and father of the gods.

9 vulgar crew common or ordinary people.

R ebound upon thyself thy light,
E njoy thine own sweet precious sight:
G ive us but some reflection;
I t is enough for us if we,
N ow in her speech, now policy,
A dmire thine high perfection.

Hymn XVI.
Of Her Will.

E ver well affected will,
L oving goodness, loathing ill,
I nestimable treasure:
S ince such a power hath power to spill[1]
A nd save us at her pleasure.

B e thou our law, sweet will, and say
E ven what thou wilt, we will obey.
T his law, if I could read it,
H erein would I spend night and day,
A nd study still to plead it.

R oyal free will, and only free,
E ach other will is slave to thee:
G lad is each will to serve thee.
I n thee such princely power is seen,
N o spirit but takes thee for her queen,
A nd thinks she must observe thee.

Hymn XX.
Of the Passions of Her Heart

E xamine not th'inscrutable heart,
L ight Muse, of her, though she in part
I mpart it to the subject;
S earch not, although from heav'n thou art,
A nd this an heavenly object.

B ut since she hath a heart, we know
E ver some passions thence do flow,
T hough ever ruled with honour;
H er judgment reigns, they wait below,
A nd fix their eyes upon her.

[1] spill kill, destroy.

R ectified[2] so, they in their kind
E ncrease each virtue of her mind,
G overned with mild tranquility;
I n all the regions under heav'n,
N o state doth bear itself so even,
A nd with so sweet facility.

Hymn XXIII.
Of Her Justice.

E xiled Astraea is come again,
Lo here she doth all things maintain
I n number, weight, and measure:[3]
S he rules us with delightful pain,
A nd we obey with pleasure.

B y love she rules more than by law,
E ven her great mercy breedeth awe:
T his is her sword and sceptre,
H erewith she hearts did ever draw,
A nd this guard ever kept her.

R eward doth sit in her right hand:
E ach virtue thence takes her garland
G athered in honour's garden:
I n her left hand (wherein should be N ought but the sword) sits clemency,
A nd conquers vice with pardon.

[2] Rectified an odd word to use here since many of its contemporary meanings involved remedying, amending, or correcting (a bad or faulty condition or state of things, as well as bringing or restoring to a good or normal condition). The word is perhaps used here fig. in reference to a literal chemical process, and thus means "purified" or "refined." More likely, it has the obscure and rare meaning of "guided" or "directed aright," although the OED dates the first usage in this sense to 1603.

[3] In number, weight, and measure from the Old Testament apocryphal book the Wisdom of Solomon, where the writer describes God's power and mercy: "Even apart from these, men could fall at a single breath when pursued by justice and scattered by the breath of thy power. But thou hast arranged all things by measure and number and weight" (11:20).

Hymn XXIV.
Of Her Magnanimity.

E ven as her state, so is her mind,
L ifted above the vulgar kind.
I t treads proud fortune under,
S un-like it sits above the wind,
A bove the storms and thunder.

B rave spirit, large heart, admiring nought,[1]
E steeming each thing as it ought,
T hat swelleth not, nor shrinketh.
H onour is always in her thought,
A nd of great things she thinketh.

R ocks, pillars, and heav'n's axle-tree[2]
E xemplify her constancy;
G reat changes never change her.
I n her sex fears are wont to rise,
N ature permits, virtue denies,
A nd scorns the face of danger.

Hymn XXVI.
To Envy.

E nvy go weep, my Muse and I
L augh thee to scorn; thy feeble eye
I s dazzled with the glory
S hining in this gay poesy
A nd little golden story.

B ehold how my proud quill doth shed
E ternal nectar on her head.
T he pomp of coronation
H ath not such power her fame to spread
A s this my admiration.

R espect my pen as free and frank,
E xpecting not reward nor thank;
G reat wonder only moves it.
I never made it mercenary;
N or should my muse this burden carry
A s hired, but that she loves it.

FINIS.

—1599

[1] admiring nought wondering or marvelling at nothing.

[2] axle-tree the imaginary or geometrical line which forms the axis of revolution of any body (such as the Earth, a planet, or the heavens).

Francis Bacon, Viscount St Alban
1561-1626

Francis Bacon was born in London, the second son of Anne (Cooke) Bacon (see pp. 169-79), daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, and sister of the wife of William Cecil, later Lord Burghley, Elizabeth I's principal minister and councillor. After leaving Trinity College, Cambridge in 1575, Francis Bacon entered Gray's Inn, one of the Inns of Court, where he studied law and began seeking a position at court. After having served as a diplomat in France, he was called to the bar in 1582. A five-time member of Parliament, the first of which seats he gained at least partly through the influence of his uncle, Lord Burghley, Bacon was an ally of the ill-fated earl of Essex from 1592 until he spoke out against a Crown grant in 1593-94, seriously damaging his career and favour with the Queen. Around this time he had a number of career and personal setbacks, failing to attain the high positions he sought, including attorney-general, solicitor-general, and master of the Rolls. He also failed to win the wife of his choice, Elizabeth Hatton, and to gain financial security: he was arrested for debt in 1598.

However, he also had some achievements in his early career, becoming Queen's Counsel in 1596 and publishing his first edition of the Essays in 1597. Bacon's star truly began to rise, first with his rejection of the earl of Essex in 1600-01, and later during the reign of James I, to whom Bacon dedicated his Advancement of Learning (1605), securing for himself the long-sought-after post of solicitor-general (1607) and attorney-general (1613). Lord chancellor from 1618-21, Bacon was imprisoned in the Tower and heavily fined after being found guilty of corruption, although James I intervened and remitted both penalties.

Bacon's final years were spent in a number of intellectual and scientific pursuits; the Novum Organum (1620), imagined as the first instalment in a major reassessment of knowledge (the Instauratio Magna) which was never completed, was dedicated to James I. Other works, including A History of Henry VII (1622), followed, but Bacon was becoming increasingly interested in scientific experimentation. He died after having contracted a cold while researching the properties of refrigeration by stuffing a fowl with snow to see whether it would preserve the meat.

Based on the example of Montaigne's Essais (Bourdeaux, 1580), the original seven of Bacon's Essays were reprinted in 1598, 1604, and 1606; in 1612 a new edition expanding the number of essays to thirty-eight appeared; and the book in its final 1625 form contained fifty-eight.

EDITIONS: "Letter to my Lord Treasurer Burghley," from Resuscitatio, or, Bringing into publick light severall pieces of the works, civil, historical, philosophical, & theological, hitherto sleeping, of the Right Honourable Francis Bacon, Baron of Verulam, Viscount Saint Alban according to the best corrected coppies: together with his Lordships life by William Rawley. London: Printed [by] Sarah Griffin, for William Lee, 1657. STC (Wing) B319; Essayes Religious Meditations Places of perswasion and disswasion. London: Printed [by John Windet] for Humfrey Hooper, 1597. STC 1137.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: John Florio and Michel de Montaigne. "To the Courteous Reader" (Florio), "The Author to the Reader" (Florio), and "Of the Cannibals" (Montaigne, trans Florio) from The Essays or Moral, Politic and Military Discourse of Lord Michel de Montaigne (1603).

Letter to Lord Burghley[1]

My Lord,

With as much confidence as mine own honest and faithful devotion unto your service and your honourable correspondence[2] unto me and my poor estate can breed in a man, do I commend myself unto your lordship. I wax[3] now somewhat ancient; one and thirty years is a great deal of sand in the hour-glass. My health, I thank God, I find confirmed;[4] and I do not fear that action shall impair it, because I account my ordinary course of study and meditation to be more painful[5] than most parts of action are. I ever bare a mind (in some middle place that I could discharge[6]) to serve her Majesty; not as a man born under Sol that loveth honour; nor under Jupiter that loveth business (for the contemplative planet carrieth me away wholly);[7] but as a man born under an excellent sovereign, that deserveth the dedication of all men's abilities. Besides, I do not find in myself so much self love,[8] but that the greater parts of my thoughts are to deserve well (if I were able) of my friends, and namely of your lordship; who being the Atlas[9] of this commonwealth, the honour of my house, and the second founder of my poor estate, I am tied by all duties, both of a good patriot, and of an unworthy kinsmen, and of an obliged servant, to employ whatsoever I am to do you service. Again, the meanness of my estate[10] doth somewhat move[11] me: for though I cannot accuse myself that I am either prodigal or slothful, yet my health is not to spend, nor my course to get.[12]

Lastly, I confess that I have as vast contemplative ends as I have moderate civil ends: for I have taken all knowledge to be my province; and if I could purge it of two sorts of rovers,[13] whereof the one with frivolous disputations,[14] confutations, and verbosities, the other with blind[15] experiments and auricular[16] traditions and impostures,[17] hath committed so many spoils,[18] I hope I should bring in industrious[19] observations, grounded conclusions, and profitable[20] inventions and discoveries—the best state of that province. This, whether it be curiosity, or vain-glory, or nature, or (if one take it favourably) philanthropia,[21] is so fixed in my mind as it cannot be removed. And I do easily see, that place of any reasonable countenance[22] doth bring commandment of more wits[23] than of a man's own; which is the thing I

---

[1] The letter was written by Bacon perhaps in 1592 after he had become an acknowledged legal authority, but before he had attained the high office of his later career. William Cecil, Lord Burghley (1520-98) was Bacon's uncle, and Elizabeth's most valued and powerful counsellor, holding the offices of secretary, lord treasurer, and principal minister. Bacon's early career owes much to his influence: he helped his nephew become an MP and secure some early patronage offices.

[2] correspondence relationship.

[3] wax grow.

[4] confirmed stable.

[5] painful demanding.

[6] in some middle place that I could discharge i.e., some middling position/office I could carry out.

[7] not as a man born under Sol that loveth honour; nor under Jupiter that loveth business (for the contemplative planet carrieth me away wholly) Sol is the sun and traditionally linked with the military service, thus the "honour" gained in war; Jupiter is traditionally the planet thought to govern the active life ("business") in the public sphere; the "contemplative" planet is Saturn, traditionally linked with the life of retirement and study. The choice between the viva activa (public life) and the viva contemplativa (life of study, and thus a private withdrawn life) is one commonly rehearsed by young men like Bacon in their letters.

[8] self love selfishness.

[9] Atlas the god who supports the world on his shoulders.

[10] meanness of my estate i.e., the lowliness of my position, both socially and financially.

[11] move "trouble," but also "impel."

[12] my health is not to spend, nor my course to get i.e., I'm not good either at spending money (through fashionable and extravagant living) nor earning it (by professional activity).

[13] purge it of two sorts of rovers i.e., purify it of two kinds of distracting influences.

[14] disputations here, wholly theoretical discussions of controversies in logic.

[15] blind unplanned.

[16] auricular conveyed by word of mouth; rumour.

[17] impostures deceptions.

[18] spoils damages.

[19] industrious painstaking.

[20] profitable beneficial.

[21] philanthropia Greek, "love of humanity."

[22] place of any reasonable countenance i.e., social position of any reasonable reputation.

[23] wits minds.

greatly affect.[1] And for your lordship, perhaps you shall not find more strength and less encounter[2] in any other. And if your lordship shall find now, or at any time, that I do seek or affect any place whereunto any[3] that is nearer unto your lordship shall be concurrent,[4] say then that I am a most dishonest man. And if your lordship will not carry me on, I will not do as Anaxagoras[5] did, who reduced himself with contemplation unto voluntary poverty,[6] but this I will do: I will sell the inheritance that I have, and purchase some lease of quick revenue,[7] or some office of gain that shall be executed by deputy,[8] and so give over all care of service,[9] and become some sorry book-maker,[10] or a true pioneer[11] in that mine of truth, which (he[12] said) lay so deep.

This which I have writ unto your lordship is rather thoughts than words, being set down without all art, disguising, or reservation. Wherein I have done honour both to your lordship's wisdom, in judging that that will be best believed of your lordship which is truest, and to your lordship's good nature, in retaining[13] nothing from you. And even so I wish your lordship all happiness, and to myself means and occasion to be added to my faithful desire to do you service.

From my lodging at Gray's Inn.[14]

—1592?

from Essays

The Epistle Dedicatory

TO MASTER ANTHONY BACON
His Dear Brother

Loving and beloved brother, I do now like some that have an orchard ill-neighboured, that gather their fruit before it is ripe to prevent stealing. These fragments of my conceits were going to print. To labour the stay of them[15] had been troublesome, and subject to interpretation; to let them pass had been to adventure[16] the wrong they might receive by untrue copies,[17] or by some garnishment which it might please any that should set them forth to bestow upon them. Therefore I held it best discretion to publish them myself as they passed long ago from my pen, without any further disgrace than the weakness of the author. And as I did ever hold,[18] there might be as great a vanity in retiring and withdrawing men's conceits (except they be of some nature) from the world, as in obtruding them: So in these particulars I have played myself the inquisitor, and find nothing to my understanding in them contrary or infectious to the state of religion, or manners, but rather (as I suppose) medicinable. Only I disliked now to put them out because they will be like the late new half-pence, which though the silver were good, yet the pieces were small. But since they would not

---

1 affect desire.

2 encounter lack of firm direction.

3 any anyone.

4 concurrent rival or competitor.

5 Anaxagoras Greek philosopher (c. 500-428 BCE), who maintained (among other things) that the stars and planets were not gods but natural phenomena; his impious views led to his banishment and impoverishment.

6 See Laertius, 2.2.6.

7 lease of quick revenue i.e., a property that would guarantee a speedy return or income.

8 some office of gain that shall be executed by deputy i.e., some public office which Bacon would hire a deputy to undertake while he himself received the income from said office.

9 give over all care of service i.e., surrender all desire for a life of public service.

10 book-maker a compiler or editor rather than an original writer (a term of contempt).

11 pioneer miner.

12 he Democritus, Greek philosopher (b. c. 460 BCE), who is reported to have said, "Of a truth we know nothing, for truth is in a well (i.e., in an abyss)" (Laertius, 2.9.72).

13 retaining withholding.

14 Even when no longer a student there, Bacon maintained rooms at Gray's Inn.

15 To labour the stay of them i.e., to work to prevent their appearance in print.

16 adventure risk.

17 untrue copies imperfect or flawed copies of the texts, unapproved by the author.

18 hold believe.

stay with their master, but would needs travel abroad, I have preferred them to you that are next myself; dedicating them, such as they are, to our love, in the depth whereof (I assure you) I sometimes wish your infirmities translated upon myself, that her Majesty might have the service of so active and able a mind, and I might be with excuse confined to these contemplations and studies for which I am fittest, so commend I you to the preservation of the divine Majesty. From my chamber at Gray's Inn, this 30th of January, 1597.

Your entire loving brother.

Fran. Bacon.

Of Studies[1]

Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments, and for abilities.[2] Their chief use for pastime is in privateness and retiring;[3] for ornament is in discourse,[4] and for ability is in judgement. For expert[5] men can execute,[6] but learned men are fittest to judge or censure.[7]

To spend too much time in them is sloth,[8] to use them too much for ornament is affectation: to make judgement wholly by their rules is the humour[9] of a scholar.[10]

They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience.

Crafty[11] men contemn[12] them, simple[13] men admire[14] them, wise men use them: For they teach not their own use, but that is[15] a wisdom without them, and above them,[16] won by observation.

Read not to contradict, nor to believe, but to weigh and consider.

Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested: that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read but cursorily, and some few to be read wholly and with diligence and attention.

Reading maketh a full man, conference[17] a ready man, and writing an exact man. And therefore if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer[18] little, he had need have a present wit;[19] and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that[20] he doth not.

Histories make men wise, poets witty;[21] the mathematics subtle, natural philosophy deep; moral grave,[22] logic and rhetoric able to contend.[23]

Of Discourse

Some in their discourse desire rather commendation of wit in being able to hold[24] all arguments, than of judgement in discerning what is true,[25] as if it were a praise to know what might be said, and

---

1 The paragraph divisions here and below are those indicated in the first edition.

2 for abilities i.e., to produce men of ability.

3 retiring retirement.

4 discourse i.e., the ability to engage effectively in social conversation and public oratory.

5 expert experienced.

6 execute perform (particular actions).

7 censure evaluate.

8 sloth laziness (since in spending too much time in private study, the gentleman neglects the sphere of public service).

9 humour governing characteristic or temperament of.

10 scholar i.e., specifically a university scholar, one not engaged in the active life of public service.

11 Crafty cunning, full of guile.

12 contemn despise.

13 simple innocent; but the pejorative meaning (foolish, ignorant) is also implied.

14 admire wonder at.

15 that is i.e., that which is.

16 For they teach … without them, and above them i.e., although the study of a particular discipline can make a student learned in its specific content and methods, this study alone is not enough: the application of a discipline's content and methods relies upon a student's engagement with and observation of the world around him.

17 conference discussing, discoursing.

18 confer discourse, engage in conversation.

19 present wit nimble intellect.

20 that i.e., that which.

21 witty ingenious, imaginative.

22 grave serious.

23 contend argue.

24 hold maintain.

25 In Renaissance faculty psychology, "wit" is described as that mental faculty which allows one to join disparate ideas and images together, while "judgement" is a mental faculty which allows one to discriminate between ideas, images, etc.

not what should be thought.[1] Some have certain commonplaces and themes[2] wherein they are good, and want[3] variety, which kind of poverty is for the most part tedious, and now and then ridiculous.

The honourablest part[4] of talk is to guide the occasion,[5] and again to moderate and pass to somewhat else.

It is good to vary and mix speech of the present occasion[6] with argument,[7] tales with reasons,[8] asking of questions with telling of opinions, and jest[9] with earnest.

But some things are privileged[10] from jest, namely religion, matters of state,[11] great persons,[12] any man's present[13] business of importance, and any case that deserveth pity.

He that questioneth much shall learn much, and content[14] much, specially if he apply[15] his questions to the skill of the person of whom he asketh, for he shall give them occasion to please themselves in speaking, and himself shall continually gather knowledge.

If you dissemble[16] sometimes your knowledge of that[17] you are thought to know, you shall be thought another time to know that you know not.

Speech of a man's self is not good often, and there is but one case wherein a man may commend himself with good grace,[18] and that is in commending virtue in another, especially if it be such a virtue as whereunto himself pretendeth.[19]

Discretion of speech is more than[20] eloquence, and to speak agreeably[21] to him with whom we deal is more than to speak in good words or in good order.

A good continued[22] speech without a good speech of interlocution showeth slowness; and a good reply or second speech without a good set speech showeth shallowness and weakness, as we see in beasts that those that are weakest in the course are yet nimblest in the turn.[23]

To use too many circumstances[24] ere one come to the matter is wearisome, to use none at all is blunt.

Of Ceremonies and Respects[25]

He that is only real[26] had need[27] have exceeding great parts of virtue,[28] as the stone had need be rich that is set without foil.[29]

But commonly it is in praise as it is in[30] gain. For as the proverb is true, that "Light gains[31] make heavy purses": Because they come thick,[32] whereas great come but now and then, so it is as true that small matters[33] win great commendation:

---

1 should be thought i.e., the truth.

2 commonplaces and themes Students were often asked to prepare speeches on a particular theme or commonplace observation or aphorism.

3 want lack.

4 part undertaking, action.

5 occasion topic or theme of conversation.

6 present occasion i.e., a topic of interest at the time, but one which lacks real substance (the topic of "light" conversation).

7 argument i.e., more substantive or serious topic of discussion.

8 reasons statements.

9 jest joking, playfulness.

10 privileged exempt.

11 matters of state i.e., things that pertain to the nation, government, and politics.

12 great persons powerful people.

13 present current, immediate.

14 content please [other people].

15 apply adapt.

16 dissemble disguise, hide.

17 that i.e., that which.

18 with good grace graciously, properly.

19 pretendeth aspires.

20 more than i.e., more important than.

21 agreeably suitably, appropriately.

22 continued sustained, lengthy.

23 in the turn in manoeuvring.

24 circumstances introductory remarks.

25 Ceremonies and Respects formal even ritualistic aspects of social behaviour and respectful comportment towards others, much like that which Sir Thomas Hoby recommends in his translation of Castiglione's Book of the Courtier (see pp. 309-31).

26 real straightforward.

27 had need needs to have.

28 parts of virtue merits, good qualities.

29 foil thin leaf of metal used in the setting of jewels and semi-precious stones to throw their colour/lustre into relief.

30 it is in i.e., it is the same for.

31 Light gains trivial profits.

32 thick frequently and in great number.

33 small matters minor acts of civility or politeness.

because they are continually in use and in note, whereas the occasion of any great virtue cometh but on holy days.[1]

To attain[2] good forms,[3] it sufficeth not to despise them, for so shall a man observe them in others, and[4] let him trust himself with the rest:[5] for if he care[6] to express them he shall leese[7] their grace, which is to be natural and unaffected. Some men's behaviour is like a verse wherein every syllable is measured.[8] How can a man comprehend[9] great matters that breaketh[10] his mind too much to small observations?

Not to use ceremonies at all is to teach others not to use them again,[11] and so diminish his respect; especially they be[12] not to be omitted to strangers and strange[13] natures.

Amongst a man's peers a man shall be sure of familiarity, and therefore it is a good title[14] to keep state;[15] amongst a man's inferiors one shall be sure of reverence, and therefore it is good a little to be familiar.

He that is too much[16] in any thing, so that he give another[17] occasion of satiety, maketh himself cheap.

To apply[18] oneself to others is good, so it be with demonstration that man doth it upon regard, and not upon facility.[19]

It is a good precept generally in seconding[20] another, yet to add somewhat of one's own; as if you will grant his opinion, let it be with some distinction; if you will follow his motion,[21] let it be with condition; if you allow his counsel,[22] let it be with alleging[23] further reason.

Of Followers and Friends

Costly[24] followers are not to be liked, lest while a man maketh his train[25] longer he make his wings shorter. I reckon to be costly not them alone which charge the purse,[26] but which are wearisome and importune in suits.[27]

Ordinary following ought to challenge no higher conditions than countenance,[28] recommendation, and protection from wrong.

Factious[29] followers are worse to be liked, which follow not upon affection to him with whom they range[30] themselves, but upon discontentment conceived against some other; whereupon commonly ensueth that ill intelligence[31] that we many times see between great personages.

The following by certain states,[32] answerable[33] to that[34] which a great person himself professeth, as of soldiers to him[35] that hath been employed in

---

1 on holy days holidays (i.e., infrequently; only periodically).

2 attain acquire.

3 good forms proper manners.

4 and then.

5 the rest i.e., with the practicing of them himself.

6 for if he care i.e., for if he takes too much trouble, if he seems to labour too obviously (in their practice and display).

7 leese lose.

8 measured calculated.

9 comprehend "understand," but also "deal with."

10 breaketh subordinates, is wholly engaged in considering.

11 again in return.

12 be are.

13 strange unknown, unfamiliar.

14 good title an appropriate behaviour.

15 keep state be somewhat formal or dignified.

16 too much too familiar.

17 another i.e., another person.

18 apply accommodate.

19 upon regard, and not upon facility i.e., because of personal respect and not because of sycophancy or flattery.

20 seconding agreeing with.

21 follow his motion agree with his proposal; follow his "lead."

22 allow his counsel accept and approve of his advice.

23 alleging adding.

24 Costly expensive.

25 train retinue (with the subsequent reference to "wings," Bacon plays on the peacock's long tail or "train," a familiar Renaissance emblem of vanity and pride).

26 which charge the purse who are an expense to (one's) income.

27 importune in suits i.e., importunate in their requests or petitions for favour and advancement.

28 challenge no higher conditions than countenance i.e., command no more significant treatment or favours than approval (a favourable look).

29 Factious those who follow a man in order to inconvenience their political rivals or enemies.

30 range ally.

31 ill intelligence misunderstanding, personal conflict.

32 certain states classes or kinds of men.

33 answerable corresponding.

34 to that i.e., to that profession or course of life.

35 him i.e., the aristocrat or person of rank that the essay is discussing.

the wars, and the like, has ever been a thing civil[1] and well taken even in monarchies, so[2] it be without too much pomp or popularity.[3]

But the most honourable kind of following is to be followed as one that apprehendeth to advance virtue and desert[4] in all sorts of persons; and yet where there is no eminent odds in sufficiency,[5] it is better to take with the more passable than with the more able.[6] In government[7] it is good to use men of one rank equally,[8] for to countenance[9] some extraordinarily is to make them insolent and the rest discontent, because they may claim a due.[10] But in favours[11] to use men with much difference and election[12] is good, for it maketh the persons preferred more thankful and the rest more officious,[13] because all is of favour.[14]

It is good not to make too much[15] of any man at first, because one cannot hold out that proportion.[16]

To be governed by one[17] is not good, and to be distracted[18] with many is worse; but to take the advice of friends is ever honourable: for "Lookers-on many times see more than gamesters;[19] And the vale best discovereth the hill."[20] There is little friendship in the world, and least of all between equals, which was wont to be magnified.[21] That that is, is between superior and inferior, whose fortunes may comprehend[22] the one the other.

Of Suits[23]

Many ill matters[24] are undertaken, and many good matters with ill minds. Some embrace suits which[25] never mean to deal[26] effectually in them. But if they see there may be life in the matter by some other mean,[27] they will be content to win a thank or take a second[28] reward. Some take hold of suits only for an occasion to cross[29] some other, or to make[30] an information whereof they could not otherwise have an apt precept,[31] without care what become of the suit when that turn is served. Nay some undertake suits with a full purpose to let them fall, to the end to gratify the adverse party or competitor.

Surely there is in sort[32] a right in every suit, either a right of equity,[33] if it be a suit of contro-

---

1 civil decent.

2 so provided.

3 popularity In both classical and Renaissance political theory, currying favour with the common people (looking to achieve "popularity") was considered a politically and socially subversive action.

4 apprehendeth to advance virtue and desert i.e., works energetically to promote or reward virtue and merit.

5 no eminent odds in sufficiency i.e., when of two candidates neither is superior.

6 take with the more passable than with the more able i.e., employ or associate with [the man] who is more easily acceptable than [the man] who is more capable.

7 government employment, business.

8 to use men of one rank equally to treat men of equal capacity or abilities, and perhaps also men of the same social rank, in the same way.

9 countenance approve of.

10 claim a due demand favours as a right (rather than request them as a gift).

11 in favours i.e., in distributing favours or rewards.

12 difference and election discrimination and choice.

13 officious ready to serve, subservient, obedient.

14 all is of favour i.e., everything depends upon a patron's favour.

15 make too much i.e., give too much attention to.

16 hold out that proportion i.e., maintain that type of treatment.

17 one i.e., the servant.

18 distracted i.e., confused.

19 gamesters gamblers.

20 And the vale best discovereth the hill i.e., the valley has the best view of a hill (people beneath the great have a clearer view of them).

21 which was wont to be magnified i.e., which we are accustomed to see celebrated; Bacon refers here to the Renaissance glorification of male friendship in texts like Cicero's Laelius: De Amicitia ("On Friendship").

22 comprehend include.

23 In the 1598 edition and all subsequent editions, this essay is entitled "Of Suitors."

24 ill matters evil suits.

25 which who.

26 deal act.

27 life in the matter by some other mean i.e., the suit "has legs," and therefore might succeed if undertaken in another way.

28 second secondary, less significant.

29 cross obstruct, hinder.

30 make obtain.

31 precept perhaps in the sense of "a rule for action or conduct, esp. a rule for moral conduct" (OED precept, n. 1a).

32 sort measure.

33 equity justice.

versy;[1] or a right of desert,[2] if it be a suit of petition.[3] If affection[4] lead a man to favour the wrong side in justice,[5] let him rather use his countenance[6] to compound[7] the matter than to carry[8] it. If affection lead a man to favour the less worthy in desert, let him do it without depraving[9] or disabling[10] the better deserver.

In suits a man doth not well understand, it is good to refer them to some friend of trust and judgement, that may report whether he may deal in them with honour.[11]

Suitors are so distasted[12] with delays and abuses that plain dealing in denying to deal in suits at first,[13] and reporting the success barely,[14] and in challenging[15] no more thanks than one hath deserved, is grown not only honourable but also gracious.[16]

In suits of favour the first coming ought to take little place.[17] So far forth consideration may be had of his[18] trust, that if intelligence of the matter could not otherwise have been had but by him, advantage be not taken of the note.[19]

To be ignorant of the value[20] of a suit is simplicity,[21] as well as to be ignorant of the right[22] thereof is want[23] of conscience.

Secrecy in suits is a great mean of obtaining, for voicing them to be in forwardness[24] may discourage some kind of suitors, but doth quicken and awake others.

But timing of the suits is the principal, timing I say not only in respect of the person that should grant it, but in respect of those which are like to cross it.

Nothing is thought so easy[25] a request to a great person as his letter, and yet if it be not in a good cause, it is so much out of his reputation.

Of Negotiating

It is generally better to deal by speech than by letter, and by the mediation of a third[26] than by a man's self.[27] Letters are good when a man would draw[28] an answer by letter back again, or when it may serve for a man's justification afterwards to produce his own letter. To deal in person is good when a man's face breeds regard,[29] as commonly with inferiors.

In choice of instruments[30] it is better to choose men of a plainer[31] sort, that are like[32] to do that that is committed to them, and to report back again faithfully the success,[33] than those that are cunning to contrive out of other men's business

---

1 suit of controversy a legal suit.

2 desert merit.

3 suit of petition i.e., a personal suit (perhaps where the suitor is seeking help in obtaining an office, monopoly, or other favour that the patron has within his power to grant or can effectively influence the granting of).

4 affection liking, and the partiality which accompanies it.

5 in justice i.e., in matters that deal with issues of law and justice.

6 countenance influence.

7 compound settle privately by agreement.

8 carry pursue or prosecute publicly through the courts.

9 depraving disparaging, speaking badly of.

10 disabling depreciating.

11 deal in them with honour i.e., act in them honourably.

12 distasted offended.

13 denying to deal in suits at first i.e., refusing to deal in suits from the moment they are proposed.

14 reporting the success barely i.e., giving an honest and unvarnished account of the outcome of one's acting in a suitor's behalf.

15 challenging claiming, demanding.

16 gracious agreeable.

17 In suits of favour the first coming ought to take little place i.e., just because a suitor has presented his petition to you first, that does not mean that this petition should receive priority over a later (and perhaps more deserving) one.

18 his i.e., the first petitioner.

19 note information.

20 value import, meaning.

21 simplicity stupidity, ignorance.

22 right justice.

23 want lack.

24 voicing them to be in forwardness i.e., revealing that they are in preparation.

25 easy sure of success.

26 third a third party.

27 by a man's self i.e., in person.

28 draw obtain.

29 breeds regard commands respect.

30 instruments agents.

31 plainer more straightforward.

32 like likely.

33 success outcome or result (whether bad or good).

somewhat to grace themselves,[1] and will help the matter in report for satisfaction's sake.[2]

It is better to sound[3] a person with whom one deals afar off,[4] than to fall upon the point at first,[5] except you mean to surprise him by some short[6] question.

It is better dealing with men in appetite[7] than with those which are where they would be.

If a man deal with another upon conditions,[8] the start or first performance is all;[9] which a man cannot reasonably demand,[10] except either the nature of the thing be such, which must go before,[11] or else a man can persuade the other party that he[12] shall still need him in some other thing, or else that he be counted the honester[13] man.

All practice[14] is to discover or to work.[15] Men discover themselves in trust, in passion, at unawares,[16] and of necessity, when they would have somewhat done, and cannot find an apt precept. If you would work[17] any man, you must either know his nature and fashions,[18] and so lead him; or his ends, and so win him; or his weakness or disadvantages, and so awe[19] him; or those that have interest in[20] him, and so govern him. In dealing with cunning persons we must ever consider their ends to interpret their speeches; and it is good to say little to them, and that which they least look for.[21]

—1597

[1] somewhat to grace themselves i.e., something to ensure that they curry favour for themselves (with their employers).

[2] help the matter in report for satisfaction's sake i.e., colour the matter in such a way as to please their employer.

[3] sound try (them) out, investigate.

[4] afar off indirectly.

[5] than to fall upon the point at first i.e., than to come immediately to the point.

[6] short blunt, without any preparation, without laying the groundwork for.

[7] in appetite i.e., when they're hungry; in a state of expectation.

[8] upon conditions conditionally (expecting in return a reward).

[9] the start … all i.e., the beginning (of any such negotiation) is crucial.

[10] demand expect.

[11] which must go before i.e., that it must be performed first without any guarantee that you will return the action or favour.

[12] he the first agent.

[13] honester having more credibility than.

[14] practice negotiation; but, perhaps, also "stratagem."

[15] to discover or to work display the true nature of your opponent or to manipulate him.

[16] in trust in trusting; in passion in anger; at unawares unexpectedly.

[17] would work i.e., desire to manipulate.

[18] fashions customs, generally accepted usages.

[19] awe cow him, put him in awe.

[20] have interest in i.e., have a stake or are personally invested in.

[21] look for expect.

George Chapman
1559/1560-1634

George Chapman is perhaps best known today for the immortalization of his most influential work—the verse translation of Homer's Iliad and Odyssey—in Keats's "On First Looking Into Chapman's Homer." Chapman's journey to the production of these poetic "realms of gold," however, was plagued by poverty, imprisonment, and ill-fated patronage relationships. Born in Hitchin, a town about thirty miles north of London, Chapman was the second son in a well-to-do middle class family, who as such had little access to his father's estate. During his career as a poet, dramatist, and soldier, Chapman was twice charged for debt, once arrested, and once imprisoned. More famously, however, he was arrested and imprisoned along with Ben Jonson for his hand in the collaborative play Eastward Ho (1605?), the satiric references to the Scots angering the new king, James I. His public life began promisingly enough, with a stint at Oxford (c. 1574) and service in the household of Sir Ralph Sadler (c. 1583). Leaving his position, Chapman saw military action in the Low Country campaigns (1591-92), returning to London sometime between 1592 and 1594, when his first work, The Shadow of Night, was published. This work reflects his membership in a group of learned young men—astronomers, mathematicians, poets, and writers—headed and supported by Sir Walter Ralegh. "The School of Night," as the group came to be known, were all interested in natural philosophy and the new sciences, as well as hermetic philosophy. Both Shakespeare (in Love's Labour's Lost) and Thomas Nashe (in The Terrors of the Night) parodied the preoccupation with esoteric and Neoplatonic philosophy as well as the intentional obscurity that characterize Chapman's first work and, to a certain extent, his second, Ovid's Banquet of Sense (1595). Chapman's dedications to both The Shadow of Night and Ovid's Banquet of Sense are partly an attempt to justify them against these attacks. His continued association with "The School of Night"—testified to by his celebration of Ralegh's Guiana expedition in "De Guiana, Carmen Epicum" (1596) and his poetic tribute to fellow "School" member, Thomas Harriot, astronomer and mathematician, in Achilles Shield (1598)—did not prevent him from producing some fifteen plays between 1596 and 1624 for three different companies.

Chapman's search for poetic patronage, however, met with mixed success: Prince Henry, James I's son, died suddenly at the age of 18 and his promised financial support of Chapman's "Homer" went unfulfilled by his father; Chapman's relationship with Robert Carr, later earl of Somerset, was affected by the scandal of Somerset's marriage to Frances, countess of Essex, and the couple's subsequent trial, imprisonment, and royal pardon for the murder of Thomas Overbury. Andromeda Liberata (1614), a celebration of Carr's marriage, was read as an allegory of Frances's imprisonment in her marriage to the aged Essex, and her liberation through its annulment and her subsequent wedding to Carr. Chapman found himself having to publish a defence of the work to silence accusations of libel. Chapman's crowning poetic achievements are his translation of the Iliad and the Odyssey (collected in The Whole Works of Homer [1616]) and Homer's minor works (The Crown of Homer's Works [1624]). The latter precedes his death by ten years, yet nothing is known of this last decade of his life.

EDITIONS: Ovids banquet of sence. London: Printed by J[ames] R[oberts] for Richard Smith, 1595. STC 4985; Achilles shield. London: Imprinted by John Windet, 1598. STC 13635; "De Guiana, Carmen Epicum," contained in Lawrence Kemys's A relation of the second voyage to Guiana. London: [Imprinted] By Thomas Dawson, 1596. STC 14947.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: George Chapman. From "A Coronet for His Mistress Philosophy" in Ovid's Banquet of Sense (1595).

from Ovid's Banquet of Sense[1]

A Coronet for His Mistress Philosophy, and His Amorous Zodiac.[2]

With a translation of a Latin copy, written by a Friar, Anno. Dom. 1400.[3]

To the Truly Learned, and My Worthy Friend, Master Matthew Royden[4]

Such is the wilful poverty of judgements, sweet Matthew, wandering like passportless men in contempt of the divine discipline of poesy, that a man may well fear to frequent their walks. The profane multitude I hate, and only consecrate my strange[5] poems to these searching spirits whom learning hath made noble and nobility sacred, endeavouring that material oration, which you call schema, varying in some rare fiction from popular custom, even for the pure sakes of ornament and utility.[6] This of Euripides exceeding sweetly relishing with me: Lentem coquens ne quicquam olentis addito.[7]

But that poesy should be as pervial[8] as oratory, and plainness her special ornament, were the plain way to barbarism, and to make the ass run proud of his ears,[9] to take away strength from lions, and give camels horns.

That enargia, or clearness of representation, required in absolute[10] poems is not the perspicuous delivery of a low invention, but high and hearty invention expressed in most significant and unaffected phrase.[11] It serves not a skilful painter's turn to draw the figure of a face only to make known who it represents; but he must limn,[12] give lustre, shadow, and heightening, which though ignorants will esteem spiced and too curious,[13] yet

---

[1] Although Ovid's Banquet of Sense did not receive a second edition until 1639, its popularity is testified to by the inclusion of twenty-five selections from the poem in R. Allott's anthology of Elizabethan verse, England's Parnassus (1600).

[2] On the genre of the coronet or crown of sonnets, see the extracts from A Coronet, in the additional online texts. The Amorous Zodiac is a translation of a French poem by Gilles Durant, describing a mistress's beauty by comparing her body to the zodiac. See M. MacLure, George Chapman: A Critical Study (Toronto, 1966), p. 59.

[3] The third work in the volume is "The Amorous Contention," a translation by Chapman's friend, Richard Stapleton, of a medieval Latin poem De Phyllide et Flora (C.S. Lewis, English Literature in the Sixteenth Century [Oxford, 1959], p. 513). It debates the relative claims of a soldier and a clerk to being "fitst for venerie" (sexual intercourse); Cupid settles the question in favour of the clerk (MacLure, George Chapman, p. 59). The title page also includes an epigram from the Latin poet Persius' "Satire 1": "Quis legat haec? Nemo Hercule nemo, vel duo vel nemo." In the satire, a poet is reciting his verse when someone asks, "Who will read stuff like that?" The poet replies "Not a soul, by Hercules. One or two perhaps or nobody" (qtd. in R.B. Waddington, "Chapman and Persius: The Epigraph to Ovid's Banquet of Sence," RES 19.74 [May 1968], p. 159). Chapman may have been attracted to Persius because, like himself, this classical satirist had a reputation for being less than direct in style and approach. Persius was also famous for castigating his society's moral and aesthetic degeneracy (pp. 160-61).

[4] Matthew Royden (fl. 1580-1622), Oxford MA (1580), and member of "The School of Night." Roydon had studied at the Inns of Court (London), was the author of occasional verse, and a friend of Sidney, Spenser, Lodge, Marlowe, and Nashe.

[5] strange unusual or exceptional to a degree that excites wonder or astonishment.

[6] The profane multitude I hate … utility That early poets, such as Homer, chose to write in such a way as to appeal to the learned at the same time that they protected themselves from the ignorant goes back at least to Plato's Protagoras.

[7] Latin, "Pray perfume not the good pea-soup." The comic poet Strattis' criticism of the Greek playwright Euripides' style which Strattis thought nauseatingly over-refined (Aristotle, De Sensu, 443b). "Olentis" is "dentis" in the original, but this is clearly a misprint.

[8] pervial clear.

[9] to make the ass run proud of his ears Proverb, "An ass is known by his ears" (i.e., "a proverb applied to them, which although they lack learning, yet will they babble and make countenance, as if they knew somewhat" [Tilley A355]). In Aesop's "The Camel and Zeus," a camel begs Zeus for the horns of a bull. Angry that the camel is dissatisfied with his great size and strength, Zeus not only refuses the camel's request but cuts off part of his ears as a punishment: A man should beware of the greed that makes him envy the attributes of others, since such greed will blind him to his own attributes and even cause their loss.

[10] absolute perfect, consummate.

[11] That enargia … phrase Renaissance writers believed that good poetry should display both enargia, a delightful surface created largely through the employment of rhetorical ornament, and energia, a compelling central idea. See G. Puttenham, The Arte of English Poesie (1589) in Elizabethan Critical Essays, ed. G.G. Smith, vol. 2 (Oxford, 1937), p. 148; and Sidney, Defence of Poesy, p. 737, note 5.

[12] limn to paint in watercolour; here, perhaps, more specifically, to adorn or embellish with bright colours, gold, or silver.

[13] spiced exoticized; too curious overly ingenious or elaborate.

such as have the judicial perspective will see it hath motion, spirit, and life.

There is no confection made to last but it is admitted more cost and skill than presently-to-be-used simples;[1] and, in my opinion, that which being with a little endeavour searched adds a kind of majesty to poesy is better than that which every cobbler may sing to his patch.[2]

Obscurity in affection of words and indigested conceits is pedantical and childish; but where it shroudeth itself in the heart of his subject, uttered with fitness of figure and expressive epithets, with that darkness will I still labour to be shadowed.[3] Rich minerals are digged out of the bowels of the earth, not found in the superficies[4] and dust of it; charms made of unlearned characters are not consecrate by the Muses which are divine artists, but by Evippe's daughters that challenged them with mere nature, whose breasts, I doubt not, had been well worthy commendation if their comparison had not turned them into pies.[5]

Thus (not affecting glory for mine own slight labours, but desirous others should be more worthily glorious, nor professing sacred poesy in any degree), I thought good to submit to your apt judgement, acquainted long since with the true habit of poesy; and now since your labouring wits endeavour heaven-high thoughts of nature, you have actual means to sound[6] the philosophical conceits that my new pen so seriously courteth. I know that empty and dark spirits will complain of palpable night, but those that before-hand have a radiant and light-bearing intellect will say they can pass through Corinna's garden without the help of a lantern.

Your own most worthily and sincerely affected,
George Chapman.

[...]

I.D. of the Middle Temple[7]

Only that eye which for true love doth weep,
Only that heart which tender love doth pierse,[8]
May read and understand this sacred vierse,[9]
For other wits too mystical and deep.
Between these hallowed leaves Cupid doth keep
The golden lesson of his second artist,
For love, till now, hath still a master missed,
Since Ovid's eyes were closed with iron sleep;
But now his waking soul in Chapman lives,
Which shows so well the passions of his soul,

[1] There is no confection ... simples Chapman uses a pharmaceutical metaphor to convey the distinction between his own complex poetry and the simpler sort desired by "ignorants." He compares his own to a "confection," a medicinal preparation compounded of various drugs, here including a sweetening and preserving agent that will make the remedy, like the poem, "last"; simpler poetry is compared to a medicine concocted of only one ingredient, especially one herb or plant; unlike the more expensive confections, simples contained no preserving agents and thus had to be used immediately ("presently"). The distinction between the two types of remedies also lies in the "book-learning" necessary to make confections, as opposed to the folk knowledge which was the basis of simples.

[2] is better ... patch i.e., is better than that which any and every shoemaker may sing while repairing shoes.

[3] Obscurity ... shadowed In his letter to Somerset, Chapman writes, "[T]he poet creates both a body and a soul in them [i.e., his verses]. Wherein, if the body (being the letter, or history) seem fictive, and beyond possibility to bring into act: the sense then and allegory (which is the soul) is to be sought: which intends a more eminent expressure of virtue for her loveliness; and of vice for her ugliness, in their several effects; going beyond the life, than any art within life, can possibly delineate." Chapman consistently defends the obscurity that accompanies allegorical writing, citing ancient authority for using such obscurity to "hide [learning and truth] from the base and profane vulgare [i.e., vulgar, ignorant, or simply 'common' men]." In the dedication to Ovid's Banquet, Chapman celebrates obscurity of conception, not simply obscurity born from the use of pedantic terms, as a method of addressing a learned audience. There are similar justifications for difficulty and obscurity in poetry in Erasmus's Adages (1500), Minturno's De Poeta (1559), and Castelvetro's commentary on Aristotle's Poetics (1576) [M. Bottrall, "George Chapman's Defence of Difficulty in Poetry," The Criterion 16 (1937): pp. 647-48].

[4] superficies surfaces.

[5] Evippe's nine daughters foolishly challenged the Muses to a singing contest, were defeated, and were punished by being transformed into magpies, birds whose singing is harsh, whose reputation is poor ("scandalmongers of the woods"), and whose voices can imitate any other sound (Metamorphoses, 5.289-335).

[6] sound explore deeply.

[7] I.D. Sir John Davies. See pp. 1137-53, above.

[8] pierse pierce.

[9] vierse verse.

And yet this Muse more cause of wonder gives,
And doth more prophet-like love's art enroll:
For Ovid's soul now grown more old and wise
Pours forth itself in deeper mysteries.

Another.

Since Ovid (love's first gentle master) died
He hath a most notorious truant been,
And hath not once in thrice five ages seen
That same sweet Muse that was his first sweet guide;
But since Apollo who was gratified
Once with a kiss, hunting on Cynthus green,
By Love's fair mother, tender beauty's queen,[1]
This favour unto her hath not envied,
That into whom she will, she may infuse,
For the instruction of her tender son,[2]
The gentle Ovid's easy supple Muse,
Which unto thee (sweet Chapman) she hath done:
She makes (in thee) the spirit of Ovid move,
And calls thee second master of her love.
Futurum invisible.[3]

Ovid's Banquet of Sense.

The Argument.

Ovid, newly enamoured of Julia, (daughter to Octavius Augustus Caesar, after by him called Corinna,)[4] secretly conveyed himself into a garden of the Emperor's Court, in an arbour whereof Corinna was bathing, playing upon her lute, and singing;[5] which Ovid overhearing was exceedingly pleased with the sweetness of her voice, and to himself uttered the comfort he conceived in his sense of Hearing.[6]

Then the odours she used in her bath, breathing a rich savour, he expresseth the joy he felt in his sense of Smelling.[7]

Thus growing more deeply enamoured, in great contentation[8] with himself, he ventures to see her in the pride of her nakedness, which doing by stealth, he discovered the comfort he conceived in Seeing, and the glory of her beauty.[9]

Not yet satisfied, he useth all his art to make known his being there without her offence, or (being necessarily offended) to appease her; which done, he entreats a kiss to serve for satisfaction of his Taste, which he obtains.[10]

Then proceeds he to entreaty for the fifth sense and there is interrupted.[11]

---

[1] Love's fair mother, tender beauty's queen Venus, goddess of love. Love = her son, Cupid.

[2] her tender son Cupid.

[3] Latin, "The future is unknowable."

[4] Ovid Publius Ovidius Naso (43 BCE-17 CE), popular Roman poet, author of Metamorphoses, Amores, and Heroides. The emperor Augustus exiled Ovid to Tomis (Costanza) on the Black Sea, partly in punishment for his scandalous and witty poem Ars Amatoria ("The Art of Love"), which Augustus also had banned from Rome's public libraries. On Ovid's reputation in the Renaissance as a "counter-Plato" and patron of sensual licence, see F. Kermode, "The Banquet of Sense," in Shakespeare, Spenser, Donne (London, 1971), pp. 89-90, and p. 101. Ben Jonson's comedy Poetaster (1602) represents Ovid in this light, especially in 4.5 and 4.6; Julia (39 BCE-c. 14 CE), only daughter of the Emperor Augustus and his wife Scribonia. Traditionally, Julia's relationship with Ovid is the other reason for Ovid's exile, given that Julia had a reputation for adultery and lasciviousness, and that the Emperor banished her at around the same time. In Ovid's Amores, the speaker compares the lustful Corinna to an Eastern queen on her way to her wedding night romp, or to a high-class prostitute (1.5.11-12; cf. Amores 2.12.1-28). On Julia/Corinna's reputation in the Renaissance, see Kermode, "Banquet," pp. 102, 105, 106, and MacLure, George Chapman, pp. 50-51.

[5] Some Renaissance writers apparently believed that Ovid's exile was most directly caused by his observation of the naked Julia bathing. However, the image of the lover/poet watching his mistress bathing is an ancient and popular one, going back at least to the story of Diana and Actaeon. When Actaeon looks upon the goddess Diana bathing naked in a pool, she punishes him by turning him into a stag and setting his own dogs upon him; they tear him to pieces. The myth is traditionally viewed as showing the fatal effects of succumbing to sexual passion (Kermode, "Banquet," p. 107). Ovid compares his fate as an exile to that of Actaeon in Book 2 of his Tristia, and this comparison seems to be the origin for this apocryphal episode in Ovid's life (L. Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense: Its Sources and Themes," JWCI 38 [1975]: p. 253).

[6] Latin marginalia: Auditus [Chapman's note].

[7] Latin marginalia: Olfactus [Chapman's note].

[8] contentation contentment.

[9] Latin marginalia: Visus [Chapman's note].

[10] Latin marginalia: Gustus [Chapman's note].

[11] Latin marginalia: Tactus [Chapman's note]. Chapman's hierarchy of the senses ultimately derives from the Neoplatonic tradition, perhaps

Narratio[1]

The Earth, from heavenly light conceived heat,
Which mixed all her moist parts with her dry,
When with right beams the Sun her bosom beat,
And with fit food her plants did nutrify;
They (which to Earth, as to their mother cling
In forked roots) now sprinkled plenteously
With her warm breath; did hasten to the spring,
Gather their proper forces, and extrude
All power but that with which they stood indued.

2[2]

Then did Cyrrhus[3] fill his eyes with fire,
Whose ardour curled the foreheads of the trees,
And made his green-love burn in his desire,[4]
When youth, and ease, (collectors of love's fees)
Enticed Corinna to a silver spring,
Enchasing a round bow'r; which with it sees,[5]
(As with a diamond doth an ameld[6] ring.)
Into which eye, most pitifully stood
Niobe, shedding tears, that were her blood.

3[7]

Stone Niobe, whose statue to this fountain,
In great Augustus Caesar's grace was brought From Sypilus, the steep Mygdonian Mountain:
That statue 'tis, still weeps for former thought,
Into this spring Corinna's bathing place;
So cunningly to optic reason[8] wrought,
That afar off it showed a woman's face,
Heavy, and weeping; but more nearly viewed,
Nor weeping, heavy, nor a woman shewed.[9]

4

In summer only wrought her ecstacy;[10]
And that her story might be still observed,
Octavius caused in curious imagery,
Her fourteen children should at large be carved,
Their fourteen breasts, with fourteen arrows gored,
And set by her, that for her seed so starved
To a stone sepulchre herself deplored,
In ivory were they cut; and on each breast,
In golden elements[11] their names impressed.

---

particularly the works of Ficino, who in Commentary on Plato's Symposium on Love (1548) orders the senses as follows: "Ratio [Reason], Visus [Sight], Auditus [Hearing], Olfactus [Smell], Gustus [Taste], & Tactus [Touch]" (qtd. in D. Bush, Mythology and the Renaissance Tradition in English Poetry [New York, 1963], p. 212, n13). Ficino goes on to state: "... of those six powers of the soul, three pertain more to the body and matter (touch, taste, and smell) whereas the other three (reason, sight, and hearing) pertain to the spirit." See Commentary on Plato's Symposium on Love, trans. S. Jayne (Dallas, 1985), 5.2.85-86. Aristotle makes sight the most important sense in terms of dealing with the "necessities of life," but hearing is the most important in the gaining of wisdom (J.P. Myers, "'This Curious Frame': Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," Studies in Philology 65 [1968]: pp. 199-200).

1 Latin, "the story."

2 This garden of sensual delights (hortus deliciarum) warns Ovid against pride, presumption, and arrogance (Kermode, "Banquet," p. 105). Myers adds that the garden is specifically not the hortus conclusus ("the enclosed garden") which is biblically and traditionally an emblem of virginity, but an open garden, suggesting the openness of Corinna and the accessibility of her chastity ("'This Curious Frame,'" p. 203).

3 <*> Cyrrhus is a surname of the Sun, from a town called Cyrrha, where he was honoured [Chapman's note].

4 Stanzas 1.1-2.3: D.J. Gless argues that these lines are inspired by Ficino's belief that love is the "perpetual knot and binder of the world, the immoveable support of its parts and the firm foundation of the whole creation" (III.iii, p. 152), for from "common relation[s] a common love is born, and from that love a common attraction.... [Hence] the magnet draws iron ... the sea turns many flowers and leaves toward itself, the moon attracts the seas [VI.x, p. 200]" ("Chapman's Ironic Ovid" ELR 9 [1979]: p. 29).

5 Enchasing set as a jewel in; <*> By prosopopaeia, he makes the fountain the eye of the round arbour, as a diamant (i.e., diamond) seems to be the eye of a ring: and therefore says, the arbour sees with the fountain [Chapman's note].

6 ameld enamelled.

7 Stanzas 3-6: Niobe, daughter of Tantalus, king of Sipylus in Lydia, boasted that her seven sons and seven daughters made her superior to Leto, mother of the sun-god Apollo and the goddess of the hunt, Artemis (or Diana). In response to Leto's grief and anger, Apollo and Artemis/Diana killed all of Niobe's children and drove Niobe's husband to commit suicide. Niobe was transformed into an eternally weeping rock (Metamorphoses, 6.132-312). Niobe is an emblem of and a warning against the sins of pride and presumption (Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 235).

8 optic reason i.e., the reason that depends on information gathered by the sight.

9 shewed showed.

10 I.e., only in summer is the terrible suffering ("ecstacy") of Niobe observable, and for this reason the Emperor Octavius Augustus carves the cause of her grief into the statue itself.

11 elements letters.

5

Her sons were Sypilus, Agenor, Phaedimus,
Ismenus, Argus, and Damasicthen,
The seventh called like his grandsire, Tantalus.
Her daughters, were the fair Astiochen,
Chloris, Naeera, and Pelopie,
Phaeta, proud Phthia, and Eugigen,
All these apposed[1] to violent Niobe
Had looks so deadly sad, so lively done,
As if death lived in their confusion.[2]

6[3]

Behind their mother two pyramides[4]
Of freckled marble, through the arbour viewed,
On whose sharp brows, Sol and Tytanides
In purple and transparent glass were hewed,[5]
Through which the sun-beams on the statues staying,
Made their pale bosoms seem with blood imbrued,[6]
Those two stern planets' rigours still bewraying[7]
To these dead forms, came living beauty's essence[8]
Able to make them startle with her presence.

7

In a loose robe of tinsel[9] forth she came,
Nothing but it betwixt her nakedness
And envious light. The downward-burning flame
Of her rich hair did threaten new access
Of ventrous[10] Phaeton to scorch the fields:
And thus to bathing came our poet's goddess,
Her handmaids bearing all things pleasure yields
To such a service: odours most delighted,
And purest linen which her looks had whited.[11]

8

Then cast she off her robe, and stood upright,
As lightning breaks out of a labouring cloud;
Or as the morning heaven casts off the night,
Or as that heaven cast off itself, and showed Heaven's upper light, to which the brightest day
Is but a black and melancholy shroud:
Or as when Venus striv'd for sovereign sway
Of charmful beauty, in young Troy's desire,[12]
So stood Corinna vanishing her tire.[13]

9[14]

A soft enflowered bank embraced the fount;
Of Chloris'[15] ensigns, an abstracted field;
Where grew melanthy, great in bees' account,
Amareus, that precious balm doth yield,
Enamelled pansies, used at nuptials still,

---

[1] apposed opposed: placed in juxtaposition to (as a contrast).

[2] confusion overthrow, ruin, destruction.

[3] In the Platonic and Neoplatonic traditions, the pyramid came to symbolize an individual's ascent from sensual apprehension of the world to a spiritual and intellectual comprehension of the realities that lay beyond it; it symbolized the possibility of humanity's relationship with the divine, Heaven with earth (J.L. Smarr, "The Pyramid and the Circle: Ovid's Banquet of Sense," Philological Quarterly 63.3 [1984]: pp. 374-75). The pyramid was more generally associated in the emblem tradition with the unimaginable age of the Egyptian world, the notion of "eternal durability," and sacred love (R.M. Ribner, "'The Compasse of this Curious Frame': Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sence and the Emblematic Tradition," Studies in the Renaissance 17 [1970]: pp. 242-43).

[4] pyramides pyramids (stress falls on the second of the four syllables).

[5] The caps of the pyramids are composed of stained glass, representing Sol and Tytanides, more commonly known as Apollo and Artemis (Diana). See p. 1167, note 7; hewed carved (with a pun on "hued").

[6] imbrued stained or soaked.

[7] stern planets' rigours i.e., the rigours of the sun and the moon, the planets traditionally associated with Apollo and Artemis/Diana; bewraying revealing, disclosing.

[8] living beauty's essence i.e., Corinna.

[9] tinsel a rich cloth interwoven with precious threads of gold or silver; sometimes, a thin gauze material so enriched.

[10] ventrous adventurous. Phaethon, son of Clymene and the sun god Apollo, persuaded his father to allow him to drive the chariot of the sun. Unable to control the fiery horses, Phaethon endangered heaven and earth before Zeus struck him down with a thunderbolt (Metamorphoses, 2.1-329). Phaethon is an emblem of pride and presumption.

[11] whited made white.

[12] Or as when Venus ... desire When Eris, the goddess of discord, threw a golden apple at the feet of Juno (Hera), Minerva (Athena), and Venus (Aphrodite), saying that it belonged to the most beautiful, Jupiter (Zeus) commanded Paris to be the arbiter of the quarrel which arose. Paris awarded the apple to Venus in return for her promise that he would possess Helen, wife of Menelaus. Fleeing together to Troy, Paris and Helen triggered the Trojan War.

[13] vanishing her tire i.e., casting off her clothes.

[14] On the symbolic significance of the flowers in stanzas 9-10, see Appendix at the end of this selection.

[15] Chloris the goddess of flowers (also known as Flora).

Diana's arrow, Cupid's crimson shield,
Ope-morn, night-shade, and Venus' navel,
Solemn violets, hanging head as shamed,
And verdant calaminth, for odour famed.

10

Sacred nepenthe, purgative of care,
And sovereign rumex that doth rancour kill,
Sya, and hyacinth, that Furies wear,[1]
White and red jessamines, merry, melliphill:
Fair crown-imperial, emperor of flowers,
Immortal amaranth,[2] white aphrodill,
And cup-like twill-pants, strewed in Bacchus'[3] bowers,
These cling about this nature's naked gem,
To taste her sweets, as bees do swarm on them.

11

And now she used the fount, where Niobe,
Tombed in herself, poured her lost soul in tears
Upon the bosom of this Roman Phoebe;[4]
Who, bathed and odoured, her bright limbs she rears,
And drying her on that disparent[5] ground
Her lute she takes t'enamour heavenly ears,
And try if with her voice's vital sound,
She could warm life through those cold statues spread,[6]
And cheer the dame that wept when she was dead.

12

And thus she sung, all naked as she sat,
Laying the happy lute upon her thigh,
Not thinking any near to wonder at
The bliss of her sweet breasts' divinity.

The Song of Corinna.

'Tis better to contemn[7] than love,
And to be fair than wise;
For souls are ruled by eyes:
And Jove's bird, seized by Cypris' dove,[8]
It is our grace and sport to see,
Our beauties' sorcery,
That makes (like destiny)
Men follow us the more we flee;
That sets wise glosses on the fool,
And turns her cheeks to books,
Where wisdom sees in looks
Derision, laughing at his school,
Who (loving) proves, profaneness, holy;
Nature, our fate; our wisdom, folly.

13

While this was singing, Ovid young in love
With her perfections, never proving yet
How merciful a mistress she would prove,[9]

[1] and hyacinth, that Furies wear Although there is an English hyacinth, the jacinth or hare-bells, the mythological significance is of prime importance here. Apollo loved the young man Hyacinthus, but in a discus contest Apollo accidentally struck and killed him. Where Hyacinthus' blood touched the ground those flowers sprang up which bear his name, inscribed with the letters AI AI ("Alas") to immortalize Apollo's love and grief (Metamorphoses, 10.149-223). Why the Furies (or Erinyes), the Greek spirits of vengeance or nemesis, might wear sya or hyacinth is unclear, although like the hyacinth the Furies were born of blood. According to Apollodorus, the great ur-god Ouranos (the Heavens) married Ge (the Earth), but Ouranos threw their offspring into Tartaros (Hell). The angry Ge incited the Titans, her later offspring by Ouranos, to attack their father. One of the Titans, Cronos (Time), cut off his father's genitals and threw them into the sea; the three Furies were born from this blood.

[2] Immortal amaranth a genus of ornamental plants known for its resistance to wilting and decaying after being picked (J. Gerard, Gerard's Herbal [1636] (London, 1985), p. 69). In ancient Greece, amaranth was a plant sacred to Artemis (Diana), the goddess of the moon, virginity, and the hunt. It is a symbol of immortality. For its many relevant medical uses and meanings, see the accompanying Appendix.

[3] twill-pants unknown; Bacchus the Greek god of wine and revelry.

[4] Phoebe Diana/Artemis, the goddess of the moon, chastity, and the hunt.

[5] disparent diverse, of various appearance (apparently referring back to the profusion of flowers and plants noted above).

[6] warm life … spread Orpheus, son of Calliope, muse of eloquence and heroic poetry, and Apollo, god of the sun, music, and poetry, was given a lyre by his father; with it he created music so powerful that it could animate rocks and trees (Metamorphoses, 11.1-105).

[7] contemn despise, scorn.

[8] Jove's bird (the eagle) is an emblem of his sovereignty and the emissary of his will. It also represents insight and dominance (Kermode, "Banquet," p. 105). Corinna imagines his bird conquered by that of Venus, representing lust and desire.

[9] proving learning, realizing; prove turn out to be.

Boldly embraced the power he could not let[1]
And like a fiery exhalation[2]
Followed the sun he wished might never set;
Trusting herein his constellation
Ruled by love's beams, which Julia's eyes erected,
Whose beauty was the star his life directed.[3]

14

And having drenched his ankles in those seas,
He needs would swim, and cared not if he drowned:
Love's feet are in his eyes; for if he please[4]
The depth of beauty's gulfy[5] flood to sound,
He goes upon his eyes, and up to them,
At the first step he is; no shader[6] ground
Could Ovid find; but in love's holy stream
Was past his eyes, and now did wet his ears,
For his high sovereign's silver voice he hears.

15

Whereat his wit, assumed fiery wings,
Soaring above the temper of his soul,[7]
And he the purifying rapture sings
Of his ears' sense, takes full the thespian[8] bowl
And it carouseth to his mistress' health,
Whose sprightful verdure[9] did dull flesh control,
And his conceit[10] he crowneth with the wealth
Of all the Muses in his pleased senses,
When with the ear's delight he thus commences:

16

"Now Muses come, repair your broken wings,
(Plucked and profaned by rustic ignorance,)
With feathers of these notes my mistress sings;
And let quick[11] verse her drooping head advance
From dungeons of contempt to smite the stars;
In Julia's tunes, led forth by furious trance[12]
A thousand Muses come to bid you wars,
Dive to your spring,[13] and hide you from the stroke,
All poets' furies will her tunes invoke.

17

"Never was any sense so set on fire
With an immortal ardour, as mine ears;
Her fingers to the strings doth speech inspire
And numbered laughter;[14] that the descant bears
To her sweet voice; whose species[15] through my sense
My spirits to their highest function rears;
To which impressed with ceaseless confluence
It useth them, as proper to her power
Marries my soul, and makes itself her dower;"

[...]

---

1 let hinder, oppose.

2 exhalation meteor.

3 Just as Renaissance (and modern) astrology asserts that an individual is influenced, shaped, and to an extent governed by the constellation and planet under which he or she is born, so Chapman makes Corinna's beauty Ovid's governing "constellation," planet, or "star."

4 Conventionally, Love's feet swiftly pursue the beloved (here, as swiftly as a glance).

5 gulfy full of whirlpools or eddies; deep as an abyss.

6 shader shadier.

7 Whereat ... soul While wings are a traditional emblem of poetic inspiration (Ribner, "'The Compasse of this Curious Frame,'" p. 237), there may also be a buried allusion to Icarus (Myers, "'This Curious Frame,'" p. 204). In classical mythology, Icarus is given a pair of wings by his father, Daedalus, so that they can escape from their imprisonment in Crete. Icarus, disobeying his father, flies too close to the sun; the wax holding his wings together melts and he falls into the ocean and is drowned. Renaissance commentators saw his story as a warning against disobedience, pride, and ambition.

8 thespian of or pertaining to tragedy, or the dramatic arts in general.

9 sprightful verdure lively, fresh, and flourishing condition.

10 conceit fancy, imagination as an attribute or faculty of the mind. Cf. Sidney, Defense (1581): "That high flying liberty of conceit proper to the poet."

11 quick living.

12 furious trance the classical furor poeticus ("poetic fury") or divine inspiration as the motivation for true poetry.

13 your spring the sacred spring of the Muses on Mount Helicon.

14 numbered laughter i.e., laughter that mirrors the song's meter and rhythm.

15 species usage obscure: perhaps, its essential qualities or specific properties?

41[1]

So vulture love on his increasing liver
And fruitful entrails eagerly did feed,[2]
And with the gold'nest arrow in his quiver,[3]
Wounds him with longings, that like torrents bleeds,
To see the mine of knowledge that enriched
His mind with poverty and desperate need:
A sight that with the thought of sight bewitched,
A sight taught magic his deep mystery,
Quicker in danger than[4] Diana's eye.

42[5]

"Stay therefore, Ovid, venture not a sight
May prove thy rudeness more than show thee loving,
And make thy mistress think thou think'st her light:[6]
Which thought with lightest dames is nothing moving.
The slender hope of favour thou hast yet
Should make thee fear, such gross conclusions proving.
Besides, the thicket Flora's[7] hands hath set
To hide thy theft is thin and hollow-hearted,
Not meet to have so high a charge imparted.[8]

43

"And should it keep thy secrets, thine own eye
Would fill thy thoughts so full of lightenings,
That thou must pass through more extremity,
Or stand content to burn beneath their wings.
Her honour 'gainst thy love, in wager laid,
Thou would'st be pricked with other senses' stings,
To taste, and feel, and yet not there be stayed."[9]
These casts, he cast, and more, his wits more quick
Than can be cast, by wit's arithmetic.[10]

44

Forward, and back, and forward went he thus,[11]
Like wanton Thamysis[12] that hastes to greet
The brackish court of old Oceanus;
And as by London's bosom she doth fleet
Casts herself proudly through the Bridge's twists,[13]
Where (as she takes again her crystal feet:)
She curls her silver hair like amorists,[14]

---

[1] The second "course" in the banquet of sense is the sense of smell, and in stanza 41, Ovid segues into the third course of the banquet, the sense of sight. Vinge points out that ll. 5-6 echo Metamorphoses iii.466: inopem me copia fecit ("abundance makes me poor"). Occurring as it does in the context of Ovid's story of Narcissus, this echo suggests that Ovid may come to the same fate as Narcissus, a fate driven by misdirected sight and lack of self-knowledge ("Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense", p. 244). The beautiful young man Narcissus cruelly rejects the love offered him by others, but, glimpsing his own reflection in a pool, falls in love with it, and pines away and dies for unrequited love.

[2] Zeus, the king of the gods, punished Prometheus for giving mankind the gift of fire by chaining him to a rock and sending an eagle (sometimes a vulture) to tear out his liver. The liver grew back each day, and each day was torn out, thus constituting an eternal punishment. The liver was also thought to be the seat of passion and desire in Renaissance humoural physiology and psychology.

[3] with the gold'nest … quiver Love personified as Cupid with the arrows of desire that, piercing an individual, fill him with longing for the beloved.

[4] <*> Allusion to the transformation of Actaeon with the sight of Diana [Chapman's note]. For the myth, see p. 1166, note 5.

[5] Stanzas 42-43: There has been some critical disagreement over who is actually speaking here, Ovid or the poem's narrator, although 43.8-9 makes pretty clear that it is Ovid.

[6] light wanton, unchaste, licentious.

[7] Flora goddess of flowers (another name for Chloris).

[8] Not meet … imparted i.e., not fit to have so great a responsibility, charge, or duty imposed upon it.

[9] stayed halted, stopped.

[10] Stanza 43.8-9: A triple pun on "cast": i.e., these "mental revolvings" ("casts") he threw out ("cast") as a trial of their soundness, his wits more quick than can be reckoned or calculated ("cast") by wit's arithmetic.

[11] <*> A simile, expressing the manner of his mind's contention in the desire of her sight, and fear of her displeasure [Chapman's note].

[12] Thamysis Greek form of "Thames," imagined as a nymph or goddess running towards her sovereign, Oceanus.

[13] The sole bridge crossing the Thames in the period, London Bridge, was notoriously dangerous to pass under (to "shoot the bridge"), since the piers that supported it "occupied quite one-half of the breadth of the river." The resultant "banking up of the tide caused a difference of level on the 2 sides of the Bridge of as much as 4 ft." (Topographical Dict., p. 316). Chapman imagines the feminized Thames being disordered by this violent passage, necessitating some cosmetic "repair" when she reaches the other side.

[14] amorist a professed lover; usually, a votary of (sexual) love, a gallant (OED suggests that this word is usually used of men).

Smooths her bright cheeks, adorns her brows with ships,
And empress-like along the coast she trips.[1]

45

Till coming near the sea, she hears him roar,
Tumbling her churlish billows in her face;
Then, more dismayed than insolent before,
Charged to rough battle for his smooth embrace,
She croucheth close within her winding banks,
And creeps retreat into her peaceful palace;
Yet straight[2] high-flowing in her female pranks
Again she will be wanton, and again,
By no means stayed, nor able to contain.

46

So Ovid with his strong affections striving,
Masked in a friendly thicket near her bow'r,
Rubbing his temples, fainting, and reviving,
Fitting his garments, praying to the hour,
Backwards and forwards went, and durst not venter[3]
To tempt the tempest of his mistress' lour,[4]
Or let his eyes her beauty's ocean enter;
At last, with prayer he pierceth Juno's ear,
Great goddess of audacity and fear:

47

"Great Goddess of audacity and fear,[5]
Queen of Olympus, Saturn's eldest seed,
That dost the sceptre over Samos bear,
And rul'st all nuptial rites with power and meed,[6]
Since thou in nature art the mean to mix
Still sulphur humours, and canst therefore speed
Such as in Cyprian sports their pleasures fix,
Venus herself, and Mars by thee embracing,[7]
Assist my hopes, me and my purpose gracing.

48

"Make love within me not too kind but pleasing,
Exiling aspen fear out of his forces,[8]
My inward sight, with outward seeing, easing,
And if he please further to stretch his courses,
Arm me with courage to make good his charges.
Too much desire to please, pleasure divorces;
Attempts and not entreats get ladies' larges;[9]
Wit is with boldness prompt, with terror daunted,
And grace is sooner got of dames than graunted."[10]

49

This said, he charged the arbour with his eye,
Which pierced it through, and at her breasts reflected,
Striking him to the heart with ecstasy:
As do the sun-beams 'gainst the earth prorected,[11]

---

[1] trips walks, skips, or runs with a light and lively motion.

[2] straight immediately, at once.

[3] venter venture.

[4] lour frown, threatening look.

[5] The description of Juno (Hera), queen of the gods, eldest daughter of Saturn, wife of Jupiter (Jove, Zeus) and goddess of marriage and childbirth is from Natale Conti's (sometimes, "Natales Comes") Mythologies. According to Conti, the ancients saw Juno as representing "the element of air ... and because the air is not only the means by which we breathe, live and see, but it stimulates in our blood a hidden natural power that enables us to apprehend dangers and to undergo them bravely, Juno was on this account believed by the ancients to inspire the powers of Fear and Daring" ("Juno," Natale Conti's Mythologies: A Select Translation, trans. and ed. A. DiMatteo [New York, 1994], pp. 78-79).

[6] Juno was most commonly thought to have been born in Samos, an island in the Aegean Sea, "because the air is most healthy there" (Conti, Mythologies, p. 72; 79); meed prize for excellence.

[7] Conti notes that in alchemical terms, Juno's responsibility for marriage in myth represents her function of "conjoining the sulphuric vapours, Venus and Mars, as it were and ... before the distilling process, she is joined with Jove, and the two together engender the alchemical Sun, hence her being called the wife of Jove" (p. 81). Given the sexual relationship between Venus and Mars, Juno perhaps is that which brings them together and facilitates such a sexual joining "because the richness of all things and the fertility of the fields arise from the temperament of the air" (p. 84), although strictly speaking, Conti refers to Mars and Hebe, in this context; Cyprian sports i.e., love games (Venus was thought to have been born from the sea near the island of Cyprus).

[8] Aspens were thought to tremble in the air.

[9] larges largess, bounty, gifts (rhymes with "charges" above).

[10] got taken from; graunted granted.

[11] prorected not in OED, but clearly from the Latin, "pro" (against) and "rectus" (projected straight, directly, or undeviatingly at).

With their reverberate vigour mount in flames,
And burn much more than where they were directed,
He saw th'extraction[1] of all fairest dames:
The fair of beauty, as whole countries come
And show their riches in a little room.

50

Here Ovid sold his freedom for a look,
And with that look was ten times more enthralled;
He blushed, looked pale, and like a fever shook,[2]
And as a[3] burning vapour being exhaled
Promised by Phoebus' eye to be a star,
Heaven's walls denying to be further scaled
The force dissolves that drew it up so far,
And then it lightens 'gainst his death and falls:
So Ovid's pow'r, this powerful sight appals.

51

This beauty's fair is an enchantment made
By nature's witchcraft, tempting men to buy
With endless shows what endlessly will fade,
Yet promise chapmen[4] all eternity:
But like to goods ill got a fate it hath
Brings men enriched therewith to beggary
Unless th'enricher be as rich in faith,[5]
Enamoured (like good self-love) with her own,
Seen in another, then 'tis heaven alone.[6]

52

For sacred beauty is the fruit of sight,
The courtesy that speaks before the tongue,
The feast of souls, the glory of the light,
Envy of age, and everlasting young,
Pity's commander, Cupid's richest throne,
Music intransed,[7] never duly sung,
The sum and court of all proportion:
And that I may dull speeches best afford,
All rhetoric's flowers[8] in less than in a word.

53

Then in the truest wisdom can be thought,
Spite of the public axiom worldings hold,
That nothing wisdom is that getteth nought,
This all-things-nothing, since it is no gold.[9]
Beauty enchasing love, love gracing beauty,
To such as constant sympathies enfold,
To perfect riches doth a sounder duty
Than all endeavours, for by all consent
All wealth and wisdom rests in true content.

54

Contentment is our heaven, and all our deeds
Bend in that circle, seld[10] or never closed,
More than the letter in the word precedes,
And to conduce that compass is reposed.[11]
More force and art in beauty joined with love,
Than thrones with wisdom; joys of them composed
Are arms more proof 'gainst any grief we prove,[12]

---

[1] extraction distillation.

[2] All of these reactions are traditional physiological manifestations of obsessive love. See J. Ferrand, A Treatise on Lovesickness, trans. and ed. D.A. Beecher and M. Ciavolella (Syracuse, 1990), chapters 13 and 14, and Hamlet, 2.1.77-100.

[3] <*> This simile expresseth the cause and substance of those exhalations which are vulgarly called falling stars: both Homer and Virgil call them, stellas cadentes, Homer comparing the descent of Pallas among the Trojans to a falling star [Chapman's note].

[4] chapmen merchants, traders, hawkers, but also an obvious pun on the poet's surname.

[5] faith faithfulness, loyalty in love.

[6] Stanza 51.7-9 i.e., it is only when love is mutual that it leads to great happiness rather than utter misery.

[7] intransed entranced.

[8] flowers adornments.

[9] I.e., worldly men see wisdom as defined by financial gain, and thus nothing can be considered wisdom which does not result in monetary gain; wisdom may encompass "all things" but it is "nothing" to such crass materialists.

[10] seld seldom.

[11] I.e., we never achieve the perfect circle of contentment we seek, just as the letter "C" remains an unfinished circle at the beginning of this word.

[12] proof impenetrable, impervious, invulnerable; prove have experience of, go through, suffer.

Than all their virtue-scorning misery
Or judgements graven in Stoic gravity,[1]

55

But as weak colour always is allowed
The proper object of a human eye,
Though light be with a far more force endowed
In stirring up the visual faculty,
This colour being but of virtuous light
A feeble image; and the cause doth lie
In th'imperfection of a human sight,
So this for love, and beauty, love's cold fire,
May serve for my praise, though it merit higher.

56

With this digression, we will now return
To Ovid's prospect in his fancy's storm.
He thought he saw the arbour's bosom burn,
Blazed with a fire wrought in a lady's form:
Where silver past the least and Nature's vant[2]
Did such a precious miracle perform,
She lay, and seemed a flood of diamant[3]
Bounded in flesh: as still as Vesper's[4] hair,
When not an aspen leaf is stirred with air.

57

She lay[5] at length, like an immortal soul
At endless rest in blest Elysium:[6]
And then did true felicity enrol
So fair a lady, figure of her kingdom.
Now Ovid's Muse as in her tropic shined,
And he (struck dead) was mere heaven-born become,[7]
So his quick[8] verse in equal height was shrined,
Or else blame me as his submitted debtor,
That never mistress had to make me better.

58

Now as she lay, attired in nakedness,
His eye did carve him on that feast of feasts:
"Sweet[9] fields of life which Death's foot dare not press,
Flow'red with th'unbroken waves of my love's breasts,
Unbroke by depth of those her beauties' floods!
See where with bent[10] of gold curled into nests
In her head's grove, the spring-bird lameate broods;

---

[1] Stoicism is a Greek school of philosophy, which advocates that men should govern their lives through reason and virtue, and thus be indifferent to pain, death, and other reversals of fortune.

[2] Where silver past the least an extremely obscure passage. The punctuation here, the word "vant," and the phrase "silver past the least" are all problematic. According to OED, "vant" is a "font" or "fountain," specifically here, a receptacle for the water used in the sacrament of baptism. In this reading, "vant" is one of two subjects of the vb. "perform," the other being the phrase "silver past the least." The "vant" may also refer to the receptacle within which alchemists performed the transformation of base metal in the stage known as the "albedo," when "the putrefied body of the metal or matter for the [alchemist's ultimate goal] the [Philosopher's] Stone ... has been washed to whiteness by the mercurial waters or fire" (L. Abraham, "Albedo" in Dictionary of Alchemical Imagery [Cambridge, 1998], pp. 4-5). Alchemical texts represent "the female principle of the alchemical opus [i.e., work], Luna, [or silver] [as that] which must be united with the male principle, Sol [or gold], in the chemical wedding, in order to create the magical philosopher's stone" (Abraham, p. 183). For a seventeenth-century illustration of Luna as a female figure surrounded by the flames of the Sun (Sol), see Abraham, p. 119.

[3] diamant diamond.

[4] Vesper Hesperus, the evening star; thus, the evening.

[5] <*> The amplification of this simile is taken from the blissful state of souls in Elysium, as Virgil feigns: and expresseth a regenerate beauty in all life and perfection, not imitating any rest of death. But in peace of that eternal spring, he pointeth to that life of life, this beauty-clad, naked lady [Chapman's note].

[6] Elysium the classical haven of the blessed dead, traditionally identified with the Christian Heaven (especially in Virgil's Aeneid, book 6). Christian writers sometimes make Elysium specifically the resting place for the souls of virtuous pagan philosophers (Dante, Inferno, book 4). Conti calls it "the heaven of philosophers" (Smarr, "The Pyramid and the Circle," p. 377).

[7] The tropic of Cancer, the zodiacal sign for those born at the beginning of July (like Corinna's original, Julia) marks the point where the days begin to shorten, signalling the long approach of winter. For Neoplatonists, this tropic took on special significance, since it became for them the entrance point where souls descended from Heaven to be embodied (Smarr, "The Pyramid and the Circle," p. 379).

[8] quick lively, animated.

[9] <*> He calls her body (as it were divided with her breasts), the fields of Paradise, and her arms and legs the famous rivers in it [Chapman's note].

[10] bent collective noun, "grass" (refers to Corinna's golden hair).

Her body doth present those fields of peace[1]
Where souls are feasted with the soul of ease.

59

"To prove which Paradise that nurseth these,
See, see the golden rivers that renown it:
Rich Gehon, Tigris, Phison, Euphrates,
Two from her bright Pelopian shoulders[2] crown it,
And two out of her snowy hills do glide,
That with a deluge of delights do drown it;
The highest two, their precious streams divide
To ten pure floods, that do the body duty
Bounding themselves in length, but not in beauty.[3]

60

"These[4] wind their courses through the painted bow'rs,
And raise such sounds in their inflection,
As ceaseless start from Earth fresh sorts of flow'rs,
And bound that book of life with every section.[5]
In these the Muses dare not swim for drowning,
Their sweetness poisons with such blest infection,
And leaves the only lookers on them swouning,[6]
These forms so decks, and colour makes so shine,
That gods for them would cease to be divine.

61

"Thus though my love be no Elysium
That cannot move from her prefixed place;
Yet have her feet no pow'r from thence to come,
For where she is, is all Elysian grace:
And as those happy men are sure of bliss
That can perform so excellent a race
As that Olympiad where her favour is,
So she can meet them; blessing them the rather
And give her sweets, as well as let men gather.

62

"Ah, how should I be so most happy then
T'aspire that place, or make it come to me?
To gather, or be given, the flow'r of women?
Elysium must with virtue gotten be,
With labours of the soul and continence,
And these can yield no joy with such as she:
She is a sweet Elysium for the sense,[7]
And nature doth not sensual gifts infuse
But that with sense,[8] she still intends their use.

63

"The sense is given us to excite the mind,
And that can never be by sense excited
But first the sense must her contentment find;
We therefore must procure the sense delighted,
That so the soul may use her faculty;[9]
Mine eye then to this feast hath her[10] invited

---

1 those fields of peace Elysium (see p. 1174, note 6, above).

2 Pelopian shoulders In classical mythology, Tantalus, king of Sipylos, and father of Niobe, killed his son Pelops and prepared the flesh for the gods to unwittingly feast upon; none of the gods touched this cannibalistic banquet except for Demeter, goddess of the harvest, who consumed the boy's shoulder. After bringing Pelops back to life, Zeus provided him with an ivory shoulder to replace the one that had been consumed.

3 In Genesis 2:10-14, these four rivers run through Eden, having sprung from a single source. The first two ("the highest two") are compared to Corinna's arms; these rivers then divide into "ten pure floods," Corinna's ten fingers. The last two are compared to her breasts, perhaps more specifically to her nipples, since breasts themselves are often compared to snowy "hills" or "mounds" in Renaissance love poetry. See Chapman's note to stanza 60.

4 <*> He intends the office of her fingers in attiring her, touching this of their courses, in their inflection following, their playing upon an instrument [Chapman's note].

5 These wind … every section In Corinna's attiring of herself (where her bodily parts are compared to "painted bowers"), her fingers' actions are compared with those of touching a musical instrument. The line—"And bound that book of life with every section"—is less clear. Probably, "bound" refers back to the action of Corinna's fingers ("every section"), which is fastening together parts of her dress over the various parts of her body ("the book of life"). There is an obvious allusion to bookbinding.

6 swooning swooning (fainting, losing consciousness).

7 for the sense i.e., in terms of the way she appeals to the physical senses.

8 sense reason.

9 Stanza 63.1-63.5 J.D. Jahn finds the source for this representation of the relationship between the sense, reason, and the soul in Ficino (5.1.164-65), but Ficino also offers a corrective to these sensual assumptions at 5.8.193 ("Chapman's Enargia and the Popular Perspective in Ovid's Banquet of Sence," Tennessee Studies in Literature 23 [1978]: p. 19).

10 her sense, not Corinna or the soul (Kermode, "Banquet," p. 110).

That she might serve the sovereign of mine eye;
She shall bid Time, and Time so feasted never Shall grow in strength of her renown forever.

64

"Betwixt mine eye and object, certain lines
Move in the figure of a pyramis,
Whose chapter in mine eye's gray apple[1] shines,
The base within my sacred object is:
On this will I inscribe in golden verse
The marvels reigning in my sovereign's bliss,
The arcs of sight, and how her arrows pierce:
This in the region of the air shall stand
In Fame's brass court, and all her trumps command.[2]

65

"Rich beauty, that each lover labours for,
Tempting as heaps of new-coined-glowing gold,
(Racked of[3] some miserable treasurer)
Draw his desires, and them in chains enfold,
Urging him still to tell it,[4] and conceal it,
But beauty's treasure never can be told:[5]
None can peculiar joy,[6] yet all must steal it.

O beauty, this same bloody siege of thine
Starves me that yield, and feeds me till I pine."[7]

[...]

72

"Not Tygris, Nilus, nor swift Euphrates," Quoth Ovid now, "can more subdue my flame.
I must through hell adventure to displease,
To taste and touch, one kiss may work the same:
If more will come, more than much more I will;
Each natural agent doth his action frame,
To render that he works on like him still:
The fire on water working doth induce
Like quality unto his own in use.

73

"But heaven in her a sparkling temper blew
(As love in me) and so will soon be wrought;
Good wits will bite at baits most strange and new,
And words well placed move things were never thought;
What goddess is it Ovid's wits shall dare,
And he disgrace them with attempting nought?
My words shall carry spirits to ensnare,
The subtlest hearts affecting suits importune:
Best loves are lost for wit when men blame fortune."

74

With this, as she was looking in her glass,[8]
She saw therein[9] a man's face looking on her,
Whereat she started from the frighted grass,
As if some monstrous serpent had been shown her;
Rising as when (the sun in Leo's sign)
Auriga with the Heavenly Goat upon her,
Shows her horned forehead with her kids divine,

---

[1] chapter here, referring to the literal Latin meaning, "head" (of a column); top; apple the pupil of the eye, or more generally the eyeball.

[2] Stanza 64.1-64.9 Based on Aristotle, this description of perception suggests that artistic creativity relies on the physical gap between the artist and the observed phenomenon. Cf. the earlier emphasis on the need for an observer to achieve a certain physical distance from Niobe's statue in order to perceive it completely (Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 236). According to Smarr, this process of perception takes the form of a pyramid, where the artist's eye is its point and the observed phenomenon its base. While this image suggests the sacred nature of Ovid's vision and that of the poet (see p. 1168, note 3 for the emblematic meanings of the pyramid), the image of sight as an arrow physically striking Ovid's eye is more ominous: it creates a parallel between Niobe's children and Ovid, the former struck down by the arrows of Apollo and Artemis, the latter in danger of being destroyed by the arrows of sight that allow desire to enter the mind and heart (Smarr, "The Pyramid and the Circle," p. 370).

[3] Racked of i.e., gotten by torture from; forcibly taken from.

[4] Draw entice, encourage; tell it i.e. count it (the gold).

[5] told a pun: "calculated, counted" and also "related, described."

[6] None can peculiar joy i.e., no one can calculate/relate joy which is personal, particular, or special.

[7] pine waste away.

[8] glass mirror.

[9] NARRATIO. <*> Ovid standing behind her, his face was seen in the glass [Chapman's note].

Whose rise kills vines, heaven's face with storms disguising;
No man is safe at sea, the Haedy rising.[1]

75

So straight wrapped she her body in a cloud,
And threatened tempests for her high disgrace,
Shame from a bow'r of roses did unshroud
And spread her crimson wings upon her face;
When running out, poor Ovid humbly kneeling
Full in the arbour's mouth did stay her race
And said: "Fair nymph, great goddess, have some feeling
Of Ovid's pains; but hear, and your dishonour
Vainly surmised shall vanish with my horror."

76

"Traitor to ladies' modesties," said she,
"What savage boldness hardened thee to this?
Or what base reckoning of my modesty?
What should I think thy fact's[2] proud reason is?"
"Love, sacred madam, love exhaling me
(Wrapped in his sulphur,) to this cloud of his
Made my affections his artillery,
Shot me at you his proper citadel,
And loosing all my forces, here I fell."

77

"This gloss is common, as thy rudeness strange[3]
Not to forbear these private times," quoth she,
"Whose fixed rites none should presume to change
Not where[4] there is adjudged inchastity;
Our nakedness should be as much concealed
As our accomplishments desire the eye:
It is a secret not to be revealed,
But—as virginity and nuptials—clothed,
And to our honour all to be betrothed.

78

"It is a want, where our abundance lies,
Given a sole dow'r t'enrich chaste Hymen's bed,
A perfect image of our purities,
And glass by which our actions should be dressed.
That tells us honour is as soon defiled
And should be kept as pure and incompressed,
But sight attainteth it:[5] for thought, sight's child,
Begetteth sin; and nature bides[6] defame,
When light and lawless eyes bewray[7] our shame."

79

"Dear mistress," answered Ovid, "to direct
Our actions by the straightest rule that is,
We must in matters moral quite reject
Vulgar opinion, ever led amiss,
And let authentic reason be our guide,
The wife of truth, and wisdom's governiss:[8]
The nature of all actions must be waide,[9]
And as they then appear, breed love or loathing,
Use makes things nothing huge, and huge things nothing.[10]

80

"As in your sight, how can sight, simply being
A sense receiving essence to his flame
Sent from his object, give it harm by seeing,

---

[1] Stanza 74.5-9: Auriga is a constellation of the northern sky, representing a charioteer; the Heavenly Goat is the star Capella in this constellation, whose offspring, known familiarly as "the Kids," are the stars Zeta and Eta Aurigae (Latin, "Haedi"). It was thought that all three goats were being carried by Auriga, the charioteer (Dict. Astronomy).

[2] fact deed, crime.

[3] gloss "explanation," but also "lie"; rudeness uncouthness/lack of courtesy; strange unusual, exceptional; thus, perhaps also, "queer, surprising."

[4] Not where i.e., not even where.

[5] honour is as soon defiled … attainteth it i.e., as soon as (a woman's) nakedness is seen, (a woman's) honour is defiled; (a woman's honour) can only be maintained in its purity when it is kept from prying eyes; incompressed not in OED; "compress" can mean to "embrace," thus "unembraced" or "untouched."

[6] bides endures, suffers.

[7] bewray betray.

[8] governiss governess.

[9] waide weighed (rhymes with "guide").

[10] Use ... nothing i.e., custom, habitual usage, or common practice makes unimportant things, important, and important things, unimportant.

Whose action[1] in the seer hath his frame?
All excellence of shape is made for sight,
Else to be like a beast were no defame;
Hid beauties lose their ends, and wrong their right:
And can kind love, (where no harm's kind can be)
Disgrace with seeing that is given to see?

81

"'Tis I (alas) and my heart-burning eye
Do all the harm, and feel the harm we do;
I am no basilisk,[2] yet harmless I
Poison with sight, and mine own bosom too;
So am I to myself a sorceress
Bewitched with my conceits in her I woo,
But you unwronged and all dishonourless[3]
No ill dares touch; affliction, sorcery,
One kiss of yours can quickly remedy.

82

"I could not times observe,[4] as others might
Of cold affects and wat'ry tempers framed,
Yet well assured the wonder of your sight
Was so far off from seeing you defamed,
That ever in the fane[5] of memory
Your love shall shine by it, in me inflamed.
Then let your pow'r be clad in lenity;
Do not (as others would) of custom storm,
But prove your wit as pregnant[6] as your form.

83

"Nor is my love so sudden, since my heart
Was long love's Vulcan, with his pants unrest,[7]
Ham'ring the shafts bred this delightsome smart.
And as when Jove at once from east and west
Cast off two eagles to discern the sight
Of this world centre, both his birds joined breast
In Cynthian Delphos, since Earth's navel hight;[8]
So casting off my ceaseless thoughts to see
My heart's true centre, all do meet in thee.

84

"Cupid that acts in you, suffers in me
To make himself one triumph-place of twain,
Into your tunes and odours turned he,
And through my senses flew into my brain,
[9]Where rules the prince of sense, whose throne
he takes,
And of my motions' engines framed a chain
To lead me where he list;[10] and here he makes
Nature (my[11] fate) enforce me, and resigns
The reins of all to you, in whom he shines.

85

"For yielding love then, do not hate impart,
Nor let mine eye, your careful harbingere[12]
That hath purveyed[13] your chamber in my heart,
Be blamed for seeing who it lodged there;

---

[1] <*> Actio cernendi in homine vel animali, videnti collocanda est. Aristotle [Chapman's note]. Latin, "The act of sight should be located in the seeing man or animal" (Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 246).

[2] basilisk a fabled reptile; its breath, and even its look, could kill.

[3] all dishonourless i.e., completely without dishonour.

[4] I could not ... observe i.e., I could not wait for a favourable opportunity or the right moment (but cf. Corinna's "private times" [77.2]).

[5] fane temple, shrine.

[6] pregnant in mental terms (in terms of "wit"), teeming with ideas; fertile, imaginative.

[7] with pants unrest i.e., with his ceaseless panting as he engages in the heavy labour described in the next line. Vulcan is the classical god of the forge, the husband of Venus, and the forger of Cupid's arrows.

[8] Stanza 83.4-7: Jove's eagles, travelling in opposite directions, seeking the centre of the world, met at Cynthian Delphos, most famously the site of Apollo's temple where oracles were pronounced, but also the site of an earlier temple, dedicated to Phoebe (Cynthia, Diana), goddess of the moon: "It was universally believed, and supposed, by the ancients, that Delphi was in the middle of the earth; and on that account it was called terrae umbilicus. This, according to mythologists, was first found out by two doves, which Jupiter had let loose from the two extremities of the earth, and which met upon the spot where the temple of Delphi was built" (Classical Dict., p. 222); hight called.

[9] <*> In Cerebro est principium sentiendi, et inde nervi, qui instrumenta sunt motus voluntarii oriuntur [Chapman's note]. Latin, "In the brain is the origin of discerning through the senses, and from thence the nerves, which are the conduits of the voluntary impulses/passions, have their origin."

[10] list wishes, desires.

[11] <*> Natura est unius cuiusque Fatum, ut Theophr [Chapman's note]. Latin, "For one and all, nature is fate, as (says) Theophrastus." The Greek philosopher Theophrastus (c. 371-287 BCE) was a follower of Aristotle.

[12] harbingere harbinger; host.

[13] purveyed furnished, arranged, prepared.

The freer service merits greater meed,[1]
Princes are served with unexpected chere,
And must have things in store before they need:[2]
Thus should fair dames be wise and confident,
Not blushing to be noted excellent."

[...]

89[3]

"I see unbidden guests are boldest still,
And well you show how weak in soul you are
That let rude sense subdue your reason's skill
And feed so spoilfully on sacred fare;[4]
In temper of such needless feasts as this
We show more bounty still the more we spare,
Chiefly where birth and state so different is:
Air too much rarefied breaks forth in fire,
And favours too far urged do end in ire."

90

"The difference of our births, imperial dame,
Is herein noted with too trivial eyes
For your rare wits; that[5] should your choices frame
To state of parts, that most doth royalize,
Not to commend mine own; but that in yours
Beyond your birth, are peril's sovereignties
Which (urged) your words had struck with sharper powers;
'Tis for mere look-like ladies and for men
To boast of birth that still be childeren,

91

"Running to father straight to help their needs;
True dignities and rites of reverence
Are sown in minds and reaped in lively deeds,
And only policy makes difference
Twixt states, since virtue wants due imperance;[6]
Virtue makes honour, as the soul doth sense,
And merit far exceeds inheritance;
The Graces fill love's cup, his feasts adorning,
Who seeks your service now, the Graces scorning."

92

"Pure love," said she, "the purest grace pursues,
And there is contact, not by application
Of lips or bodies, but of bodies' virtues,
As in our elemental nation[7]
Stars by their powers, which are their heat and light,
Do heavenly works, and that which hath probation
By virtual contact hath the noblest plight,[8]
Both for the lasting[9] and affinity
It hath with natural divinity."

93

Ovid replied, "In this thy virtual presence
(Most fair Corinna) thou canst not effuse
The true and solid parts of thy pure essence,
But dost the superficial beams produce
Of thy rich substance; which because they flow
Rather from form than from the matter's use,
Resemblance only of thy body show,
Whereof they are thy wondrous species,[10]
And 'tis thy substance must my longings ease.

94

"Speak then, sweet air, that giv'st our speech event,[11]
And teach my mistress tractability,
That art to motion most obedient,[12]
And though thy nature swelling be and high

---

1 meed recompense, reward.

2 Princes are … they need i.e., princes often don't announce their arrival and must be offered cheer (hospitable entertainment [food, lodging, etc.]) which there is often no opportunity to prepare properly in advance ("unexpected cheer"), and thus hosts ("harbingers") must have things ready ("in store") before they (the princes, but also the harbingers) need them.

3 Corinna responds here to Ovid's justification.

4 spoilfully destructively; characterized by plundering; fare food.

5 that i.e., your rare wits as opposed to the conventional dedication to status and wealth.

6 Twixt between; imperance commanding quality; commandingness.

7 elemental nation perhaps, material as opposed to spiritual nativity or nature.

8 probation test or trial; plight manner of being, condition.

9 lasting permanence.

10 species Cf. stanza 17.5.

11 that giv'st our speech event i.e., that makes our speech possible.

12 That art to motion most obedient i.e., said of the air because it moves in response to the slightest actions of the human body.

And occupiest so infinite a space,
Yet yield'st to words, and art condensed thereby,
Past nature pressed into a little place.
Dear sovereign, then, make air thy rule in this,
And me thy worthy servant with a kiss."

95

"Ovid," said she, "I am well pleased to yield.
Bounty by virtue cannot be abused,
Nor will I coyly lift Minerva's[1] shield
Against Minerva; honour is not bruised
With such a tender pressure as a kiss,
Nor yielding soon to words, though seldom used.
Niceness[2] in civil favours, folly is;
Long suits make never good a bad detection,[3]
Nor yielding soon makes bad a good affection.

96

"To some I know, (and know it for a fault)
Order and reverence are repulsed in scaling,
When pride and rudeness enter with assault,
Consents to fall are worse to get than falling.
Willing resistance takes away the will,
And too much weakness 'tis to come with calling.
Force in these frays is better man than skill,[4]
Yet I like skill, and Ovid if a kiss
May do thee so much pleasure, here it is."

97

Her moving towards him made Ovid's eye
Believe the firmament was coming down
To take him quick[5] to immortality,
And that th'ambrosian[6] kiss set on the crown.
She spake in kissing, and her breath infused
Restoring syrup to his taste, in swoun:
And he imagined Hebe's hands had bruised
A banquet of the gods into his sense,[7]
Which filled him with this furious[8] influence:

98

"The motion of the heavens that did beget
The golden age, and by whose harmony
Heaven is preserved, in me on work is set;[9]
All instruments of deepest melody,
Set sweet in my desires to my love's liking
With this sweet kiss in me their tunes apply,
As if the best musicians' hands were striking.
This kiss in me hath endless music closed,[10]
Like Phoebus' lute on Nisus' tow'rs imposed.

99

"And as a pibble cast into a spring,
We see a sort of trembling circles rise,
One forming other in their issuing
Till over all the fount they circulize,[11]

---

[1] Minerva Roman goddess of wisdom, the arts and war.

[2] Niceness reserve, shyness, coyness.

[3] suits wooing or courting of a woman; courtship; detection uncertain, perhaps "concealed intention" (see OED, "detect," vb.).

[4] Force ... skill i.e., using force in these conflicts is more manly than using skill.

[5] quick (still) living.

[6] ambrosian having the qualities of ambrosia, the fabled food of the classical gods. The kiss crowns him a god in the heaven he experiences in the moment of said kiss.

[7] And ... sense Hebe is the daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera); she prepares the classical gods' special drink, nectar (ambrosia), by squeezing or crushing ("bruising") the grapes into cups.

[8] furious i.e., as in the divine inspiration for poetry known as "furor poeticus."

[9] Stanza 98.1-98.3 Referring to the Ptolemaic notion of the universe as a series of concentric spheres, set one inside of the other with the earth at its centre; these spheres, in their motion, created a harmonious and divine music, the music of the spheres. In classical literature, the golden age was the age of original human and natural perfection, with more recent history divided into a series of increasingly degenerate periods, characterized by violence and impiety: the ages of silver, bronze, and iron. Christian writers often represented the usurpation of Saturn by Jupiter as the fall from the worship of the one true god into antiquity's dedication to paganism.

[10] closed enclosed, encompassed. According to Ovid, there was a tower on the walls of the city of King Nisus where Apollo (Phoebus), god of the sun and music, put down his lyre, infusing the stones with music (Metamorphoses, 8.1-29). For the story of Nisus' daughter, Scylla, her crazed love for the city's besieger, King Minos of Crete, and her consequent betrayal of her father and people, see Metamorphoses, 8.30-150.

[11] And as a pebble ... circulize From the Middle Ages on, scholars often explained how sound moved through the air by using the analogy of how a pebble thrown into a body of water produces circles that spread outward from the point of impact (Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 249).

So this perpetual-motion-making kiss
Is propagate through all my faculties,
And makes my breast an endless fount of bliss,
Of which, if gods could drink, their matchless fare
Would make them much more blessed than they are.

100

"But[1] as when sounds do hollow bodies beat,
Air gathered there, compressed, and thickened,
The self same way she came doth make retreat,
And so effects the sound reechoed
Only in part, because she weaker is
In that redition[2] than when first she fled:
So I, alas, faint echo of this kiss,
Only reiterate a slender part
Of that high joy it worketh in my heart.

101

"And thus with feasting, love is famished more,
Without my touch are all things turned to gold,
And till I touch, I cannot joy my store.[3]
To purchase others,[4] I myself have sold;
Love is a wanton famine, rich in food,
But with a richer appetite controlled,
An argument in figure and in mood,[5]
Yet hates all arguments, disputing still
For sense 'gainst reason with a senseless[6] will.

102

"Then, sacred madam, since my other senses
Have in your graces tasted such content,
Let wealth not to be spent,[7] fear no expenses,
But give thy bounty true eternizement,[8]
Making my senses' ground-work, which is feeling,
Effect the other, endless excellent,
Their substance[9] with flint-softening softness steeling:
Then let me feel, for know, sweet beauty's queen,
Dames may be felt, as well as heard or seen.

103

"For if we be allowed to serve the ear
With pleasing tunes, and to delight the eye
With gracious shows, the taste with dainty cheer,[10]
The smell with odours, is't immodesty
To serve the senses' emperor, sweet feeling,
With those delights that fit his empery?
Shall subjects free themselves and bind their king?
Minds taint no more with bodies' touch or tire,
Than bodies nourish with the minds' desire.

104

"The mind then clear, the body may be used,
Which perfectly your touch can spritualize;[11]
As by the great elixir is transfused
Copper to gold, then grant that deed of prize.[12]
Such as transform into corrupt effects
What they receive from nature's purities,
Should not wrong them that hold her due respects:
To touch your quick'ning[13] side then give me leave,
Th'abuse of things must not the use bereave."

---

1 <*> Qua ratione fiat Eccho [Chapman's note]. Latin, "The theory of the method by which an echo is produced."

2 redition the action of going or coming back; return.

3 Cf. stanza 65.8-9. Although unlike Midas in Ovid's Metamorphoses, 11.68-198, Ovid asserts that his touch is not necessary to turn everything to gold, yet unless he can touch "all things" he cannot enjoy or rejoice in his treasures ("store").

4 others perhaps, other senses.

5 in figure and in mood i.e., in due logical form (see OED, "mood," n[2]).

6 sense sensation, sensuality; senseless unreasonable, irrational.

7 Let wealth not to be spent i.e., do not oppose the spending of wealth.

8 eternizement immortalization; immortal fame.

9 Effect the other… Their substance i.e., effect the substance of the other senses.

10 cheer food, fare.

11 spritualize spiritualize.

12 deed of prize deed of price: valuable, precious (perhaps, worthy or excellent) action. According to Vinge, just as alchemy can transform copper into gold, so Corinna's touch can transform the body from a physical to a spiritual entity ("Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 250). Smarr adds that copper is "the element of Venus" which is transmuted in the alchemical process to gold, the element of "the intellectual Sun" ("The Pyramid and the Circle," p. 380). Cf. stanza 56.

13 quick'ning living.

105

Herewith, even glad his arguments to hear,
Worthily willing to have lawful grounds
To make the wondrous power of Heaven appear
In nothing more than her perfections found,
Close to her navel she her mantle wrests,
Slacking it upwards, and the folds unwound,
Showing Latona's twins,[1] her plenteous breasts,
The Sun and Cynthia in their triumph-robes
Of lady-skin, more rich than both their globes.

106

Whereto she bad[2] blest Ovid put his hand.
He, well acknowledging it much too base
For such an action, did a little stand,
Ennobling it with titles full of grace,
And conjures it with charge of reverend verse,
To use with piety that sacred place,
And through his feeling's organ to disperse
Worth to his spirits, amply to supply
The poorness of his flesh's faculty.

107[3]

And thus he said: "King of the king of senses,
Engines of all the engines under Heaven,
To health, and life, defence of all defences,
Bounty by which our nourishment is given,
Beauty's beautifier, kind acquaintance maker,
Proportion's oddness that makes all things even,[4]
Wealth of the labourer, wrong's revengement-taker,
Pattern of concord, lord of exercise,
And figure of that power the world did guise:[5]

108

"Dear hand, most duly honoured in this
And therefore worthy to be well employed:
Yet know, that all that honour nothing is,
Compared with that which now must be enjoyed.
So think in all the pleasures these have shown
(Likened to this) thou wert but mere annoyed,
That all hands' merits in thyself alone
With this one touch have more than recompense,
And therefore feel with fear and reverence.

109

"See Cupid's Alps[6] which now thou must go over,
Where snow that thaws the sun doth ever lie;
Where thou may'st plain and feelingly discover
The world's fore-past that flowed with milk and honey;[7]
Where, (like an empress seeing nothing wanting
That may her glorious child-bed beautify)
Pleasure herself lies big with issue panting,[8]
Ever[9] delivered, yet with child still growing,
Full of all blessings, yet all bliss bestowing."

110

This said, he laid his hand upon her side,
Which made her start like sparkles from a fire,
Or like Saturnia from th'ambrosian pride
Of her morn's slumber, frighted with admire,
When Jove laid young Alcides to her breast,[10]
So startled she, not with a coy retire
But with the tender temper she was blest,
Proving her sharp, undulled with handling yet,
Which keener edge on Ovid's longings set.

111

And feeling still, he sighed out this effect:
"Alas, why lent not heaven the soul a tongue?
Nor language, nor peculiar dialect,
To make her high conceits as highly sung,

---

1 Latona's twins Apollo (the Sun) and Artemis/Diana (Cynthia).

2 bad past tense of "bid": commanded.

3 In stanzas 107-09, Ovid addresses his hand.

4 Proportion's oddness ... even i.e., although each hand has five fingers (an odd number), together both hands make the even number "ten."

5 figure represented form, image, likeness; guise dress, array.

6 Cupid's Alps her breasts.

7 fore-past here, used as a noun, meaning "earlier age" (not a use noted in OED); that flowed with milk and honey the Scriptural Promised Land. See, for example, Exodus 3:8, 3:17; 33:3; Ezekiel 20:6, 20:15.

8 big with issue panting heavily pregnant and in the throes of labour.

9 Ever always.

10 Saturnia's (Juno's) husband, Jupiter (Zeus), placed the baby Alcides (Hercules) on her breast while she slept. Suckling, the infant Hercules became an immortal, and the milk that sprayed from the startled Juno's breasts became the Milky Way. See Conti, "On Juno" (pp. 74-75).

But that a fleshly engine[1] must unfold
A spiritual notion; birth from princes sprung
Peasants must nurse, free virtue wait on gold,
And a professed though flattering enemy
Must plead my honour and my liberty.

112

"O nature, how dost thou defame in this
Our human honours? yoking men with beasts
And noblest minds with slaves? thus beauty's bliss,
Love and all virtues that quick spirit feasts
Surfeit on flesh; and thou that banquets minds,
Most bounteous mistress, of thy dull-tongued guests
Reap'st not due thanks; thus rude frailety[2] binds
What thou giv'st wings; thus joys I feel in thee
Hang on thy lips and will not uttered be.

113

"Sweet touch, the engine that Love's bow doth bend,
The sense wherewith he feels him deified,
The object whereto all his actions tend,
In all his blindness his most pleasing guide,
For thy sake[3] will I write the Art of Love,
Since thou dost blow his fire and feed his pride,
Since in thy sphere his health and life doth move,
For thee I hate who hate society
And such as self-love makes his slavery.

114

"In these dog-days how this contagion[4] smothers
The purest bloods with virtue's diet fined:[5]
Nothing their own unless they be some others;
Spite of themselves, are in themselves confined,[6]
And live so poor they are of all despised;
Their gifts, held down with scorn, should be divined,
And they like mummers' mask,[7] unknown, unprized:
A thousand marvels mourn in some such breast
Would make a kind and worthy patron blest.

115

"To me, dear sovereign, thou art patroness,
And I, with that thy graces have infused,
Will make all fat and foggy[8] brains confess,
Riches may from a poor verse be deduced,
And that gold's love shall leave them grovelling here,
When thy perfections shall to Heaven be mused,
Decked in bright verse, where angels shall appear
The praise of virtue, love, and beauty singing, Honour to noblesse, shame to avarice bringing."

116

Here Ovid interrupted with the view
Of other dames, who then the garden painted,[9]
Shrouded himself, and did as death eschew
All note by which his love's fame[10] might be tainted.
And as when mighty Macedon had won
The monarchy of Earth, yet when he fainted
Grieved that no greater action could be done,
And that there were no more worlds to subdue,[11]
So love's defects, love's conqueror did rue.

---

[1] fleshly engine the tongue.

[2] frailety frailty (3 syllables).

[3] For thy sake i.e., for the sake of the sense of touch, but perhaps also for Corinna. In Ars Amatoria ("The Art of Love") Ovid offers a mock educational manual on the art of seduction, which satirizes the degradation and exploitation of love for the purpose of sexual satisfaction.

[4] dog-days from ancient times believed the hottest and most unwholesome period of the year; contagion contagious or communicable disease; pestilence or plague ("this contagion" refers back to the "self-love," which Chapman presents as a kind of epidemic).

[5] fined made pure; refined or clarified.

[6] Nothing their own … confined i.e., not belonging to themselves at all, unless they be some others' in spite of themselves, (they) are in themselves confined.

[7] mummers' mask Mummings were an early English form of dramatic entertainment, including dumb-shows and masquerades, usually associated with holidays such as New Year.

[8] fat slow-witted, indolent, self-complacent; foggy unwholesomely bloated; thus, dull, bemuddled, confused.

[9] painted decorated, adorned, ornamented.

[10] fame reputation.

[11] Alexander the Great, king of Macedonia, reputedly had this reaction after conquering the known world. For the probable source of this legend, see Plutarch's essay "On Contentment."

117[1]

But as when expert painters have displayed,
To quickest[2] life a monarch's royal hand
Holding a sceptre, there is yet bewrayed
But half his fingers; when we understand
The rest not to be seen, and never blame
The painter's art, in nicest censures[3] scanned:
So in the compass of this curious[4] frame,
Ovid well knew there was much more intended,
With whose omission none must be offended.

Intentio, animi actio.
Explicit convivium.[5]

—1595

De Guiana, Carmen Epicum[6]

What work of honour[7] and eternal name,
For all the world t'envy and us t'achieve,
Fills me with fury,[8] and gives armed hands
To my heart's peace, that else would gladly turn
My limbs and every sense into my thoughts
Rapt with the thirsted action of my mind?
O Clio,[9] honour's Muse, sing in my voice,
Tell the attempt, and prophesy th'exploit
Of his Eliza-consecrated[10] sword,
That in this peaceful charm of England's sleep,
Opens most tenderly her[11] aged throat,
Off'ring to pour fresh youth through all her veins,
That flesh of brass, and ribs of steel retains.

Riches, and conquest, and renown I sing,
Riches with honour, conquest without blood,
Enough to seat the monarchy of earth,
Like to Jove's eagle,[12] on Eliza's hand.
Guiana, whose rich feet are mines of gold,
Whose forehead knocks against the roof of stars,
Stands on her tip-toes at fair England looking,
Kissing her hand, bowing her mighty breast,
And every sign of all submission making,
To be her sister and the daughter both
Of our most sacred maid:[13] whose barrenness
Is the true fruit of virtue, that may get,[14]
Bear, and bring forth anew in all perfection
What heretofore savage corruption held
In barbarous chaos; and in this affair
Become her father, mother, and her heir.

Then most admired sovereign, let your breath
Go forth upon the waters, and create
A golden world in this our iron age,[15]
And be the prosperous forewind to a fleet,

---

[1] The comparison of poetry to painting is a commonplace of Renaissance literary theory. Poetry as speaking picture (ut pictura poesis) appears most famously in Sidney's Defence of Poesy (1581): "Poesy therefore is an art of imitation, for so Aristotle termeth it in the word μίμησις—that is to say, a representing, counterfeiting, or figuring forth—to speak metaphorically, a speaking picture—with this end, to teach and delight." See pp. 719-20.

[2] quickest most animated.

[3] nicest censures most fastidious or exacting judgements.

[4] curious beautifully or artistically made; perhaps also, an acknowledgment of the poem's difficulty.

[5] Latin, "The aim is an act of the soul" (Vinge, "Chapman's Ovid's Banquet of Sense," p. 251) and "The banquet/symposium is finished."

[6] Latin, "An Epic Song About Guiana," first printed in Lawrence Keymis's A Relation of the Second Voyage to Guiana (1596) and reprinted in Hakluyt's Principle Navigations (1600), Vol. 3, p. 167. Keymis's text presents Ralegh's second expedition to Guiana in 1596. Although it reached the mouth of the Orinoco River, the expedition was not successful in discovering the gold which was Ralegh's ultimate goal. See pp. 1120-36.

[7] work of honour the conquest of Guiana, the personal and national benefits of which the rest of the poem depicts.

[8] fury here, not anger or wrath but the classically based idea of furor poeticus, the divine inspiration which Chapman depicts as the source of his poem.

[9] Clio muse of epic poetry and history.

[10] his Sir Walter Ralegh's; Eliza Elizabeth I.

[11] her i.e., the English nation's.

[12] Jove's eagle In classical mythology Jove's (Jupiter's) eagle was an emblem of divine power, since it was said to carry Jove's thunder underneath its wings. Here, the reference is also to the eagle's function as Jove's messenger and instrument of power (Classical Dict., p. 340).

[13] maid Elizabeth I (a "maid" is an unmarried, virginal woman).

[14] get engender, impregnate; beget (said of the male parent).

[15] A golden world in this our iron age On the golden world and iron age, see p. 1180, note 9. The previous line echoes the description of God's acts of creation in Genesis 1:2 ("The earth was without form and void, and darkness was upon the face of the deep; and the Spirit of God was moving over the face of the waters") and 2:7 ("then the Lord God formed man of dust from the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living being").

That, seconding your last, may go before it[1]
In all success of profit and renown:
Doubt not but your election[2] was divine,
(As well by Fate as your high judgement ordered)
To raise him with choice bounties,[3] that could add
Height to his height; and like a liberal vine,
Not only bear his virtuous fruit aloft,
Free from the press of squint-eyed Envy's feet,
But deck his gracious prop[4] with golden bunches,
And shroud it with broad leaves of rule o'er-grown
From all black tempests of invasion.

Those conquests[5] that like general earthquakes shook
The solid world, and made it fall before them,
Built all their brave attempts on weaker grounds,
And less persuasive likelihoods than this;
Nor was there ever princely fount so long
Poured forth a sea of rule with so free course,
And such ascending majesty as you.
Then be not like a rough and violent wind,
That in the morning rends the forests down,
Shoves up the seas to heaven, makes earth to tremble,
And tombs his wasteful bravery in the even;[6]
But as a river from a mountain running,
The further he extends, the greater grows,
And by his thrifty race strengthens his stream,
Even to join battle with th'imperious sea
Disdaining his repulse, and in despite
Of his proud fury, mixeth with his main,[7]
Taking on him his titles and commands:

So let thy sovereign empire be increased,
And with Iberian Neptune part the stake,[8]
Whose trident he the triple world would make.[9]
You then that would be wise in wisdom's spite,
Directing with discredit[10] of direction,
And hunt for honour, hunting him to death,
With whom before you will inherit gold,
You will lose gold, for which you lose your souls;
You that choose nought for right, but certainty,
And fear that valour will get only blows,
Placing your faith in incredulity;[11]
Sit till you see a wonder, virtue rich:
Till honour having gold, rob gold of honour;
Till as men hate desert that getteth nought,[12]
They loathe all getting that deserves not ought,[13]
And use you gold-made men, as dregs of men;
And till your poisoned souls, like spiders lurking
In sluttish[14] chinks, in mists of cobwebs hide
Your foggy[15] bodies, and your dunghill pride.

O incredulity, the wit of fools,
That slovenly will spit on all things fair,
The coward's castle, and the sluggard's cradle,
How easy 'tis to be an infidel?

But you patrician[16] spirits that refine
Your flesh to fire, and issue like a flame
On brave endeavours, knowing that in them

---

1 I.e., that, succeeding or following your last or most recent fleet, may outdo or outstrip it.

2 election decision.

3 him Ralegh; bounties gifts; favours.

4 prop support (stick, rod, etc.) used to sustain an incumbent weight; here, Elizabeth I is Ralegh's prop and support. In return, he bears golden grapes (referring to the riches of imperial conquest) and protects Elizabeth's colonial possessions from attack ("invasion," l. 44).

5 Those conquests i.e., of territories in the Americas, Asia, the Caribbean, and Africa.

6 tombs buries; bravery display, show; even evening.

7 main high sea or open sea.

8 Iberian of or pertaining to ancient Iberia (comprising Spain and Portugal, the Iberian peninsula); here, "Iberian Neptune," is specifically Spain, the rival power already entrenched in the territories near Guiana, and the dominant naval power in this period. In classical mythology, Neptune was the god of sea, and his trident, a three-pronged forked weapon, is the emblem of his sovereignty; part the stake share.

9 Whose trident ...make i.e., the Spaniards aspire to rule over not just the earth, but the "triple world": the earth, the seas, and the underworld.

10 discredit impaired reputation, reproach.

11 incredulity scepticism.

12 desert merit, worthiness; nought nothing.

13 ought anything.

14 sluttish grimy, dirty.

15 foggy unwholesomely bloated; flabby.

16 patrician noble, aristocratic.

The tract[1] of heaven in morn-like glory opens,
That know you cannot be the kings of earth,
(Claiming the rights of your creation)[2]
And let the mines of earth be kings of you;
That are so far from doubting likely drifts,[3]
That in things hardest y'are most confident;
You that know death lives, where power lives unused,
Joying to shine in waves that bury you,
And so make way for life even through your graves;
That will not be content like horse to hold
A thread-bare beaten way to home affairs,
But where the sea in envy of your reign,
Closeth her womb, as fast as 'tis disclosed,
That she like Avarice might swallow all,
And let none find right passage through her rage:
There your wise souls as swift as Eurus[4] lead
Your bodies through to profit and renown,
And scorn to let your bodies choke your souls,
In the rude breath and prisoned life of beasts;
You that herein renounce the course of earth,
And lift your eyes for guidance to the stars,
That live not for yourselves, but to possess[5]
Your honoured country of a general store;[6]
In pity of the spoil[7] rude self-love makes,
Of them whose lives and yours one air doth feed,
One soil doth nourish, and one strength combine;
You that are blest with sense of all things noble
In this attempt your complete worths redouble.

But how is Nature at her heart corrupted,
(I mean even in her most ennobled birth?)
How in excess of sense[8] is sense bereft her?
That her most lightning-like effects of lust
Wound through her flesh, her soul, her flesh unwounded;
And she must need incitements to her good,
Even from that part[9] she hurts. O how most like
Art thou (heroic author of this act)[10]
To this wronged soul of Nature: that sustain'st
Pain, charge,[11] and peril for thy country's good,
And she much like a body numbed with surfeits,[12]
Feels not thy gentle applications[13]
For the health, use, and honour of her powers.
Yet shall my verse through all her ease-locked[14] ears
Trumpet the noblesse[15] of thy high intent,
And if it cannot into act proceed,
The fault and bitter penance of the fault
Make red some others' eyes with penitence,
For thine are clear; and what more nimble spirits
Apter to bite at such unhooked baits,[16]
Gain by our loss, that must we needs confess
Thy princely valour would have purchased us,
Which shall be fame eternal to thy name,
Though thy contentment in thy grave desires
Of our advancement fail deserved effect.
Oh how I fear thy glory which I love,
Lest it should dearly grow by our decrease!
Natures that stick in golden-graveled springs,
In muck-pits cannot 'scape their swallowings.
But we shall forth I know; gold is our fate,
Which all our acts doth fashion and create.

---

1 tract expansive space.

2 kings of earth … creation a reference to the absolute dominion God grants mankind over creation in Genesis 1:26-30.

3 likely that which looks as if it will happen or be realized; drifts schemes, plans.

4 Eurus an eastern wind in classical mythology (Classical Dict., p. 263).

5 possess give possession to.

6 general commonly available; store sufficient supply; also, "treasure."

7 spoil damage, harm.

8 sense (1) i.e., the physical senses, considered (especially) as channels for gratifying the desire for pleasure and the lusts of the flesh; sensual pleasure; and (2) mental faculties or intellectual abilities.

9 part i.e., the soul.

10 heroic author of this act Ralegh.

11 charge load of trouble, expense, and/or responsibility, blame.

12 surfeits an excessive indulgence in food or drink that overloads the stomach and disorders the system.

13 applications medicines, remedies.

14 ease-locked made deaf through luxury and leisure.

15 noblesse nobleness, nobility.

16 I.e., baits that are innocent because they don't contain a hook.

Then in the Thespiads'[1] bright prophetic fount,
Methinks I see our Liege rise from her throne,
Her ears and thoughts in steep amaze erected
At the most rare endeavour of her power.
And now she blesseth with her wonted[2] graces
Th'industrious knight, the soul of this exploit,
Dismissing him to convoy of his stars.[3]
And now for love and honour of his worth,
Our twice-born nobles[4] bring him bridegroom-like,
That is espoused for virtue to his love
With feasts and music, ravishing the air,
To his Argolian fleet,[5] where round about
His bating colours[6] English valour swarms
In haste, as if Guianian Orenoque[7]
With his fell waters fell[8] upon our shore.
And now a wind as forward[9] as their spirits,
Sets their glad feet on smooth Guiana's breast,
Where (as if each man were an Orpheus)
A world of savages fall tame before them,[10]
Storing their theft-free treasuries with gold,
And there doth plenty crown their wealthy fields,
There Learning eats no more his thriftless[11] books,
Nor Valour estridge-like[12] his iron arms.
There Beauty is no strumpet for her wants,[13]
Nor Gallic humours[14] putrefy her blood;
But all our youth take Hymen's lights[15] in hand,
And fill each roof with honoured progeny.
There makes society adamantine[16] chains,
And joins their hearts with wealth, whom wealth disjoined.
There healthful recreations strow their meads,[17]
And make their mansions dance with neighbourhood,[18]
That here were drowned in churlish avarice.
And there do palaces and temples rise

[1] Thespiads the nine Muses, so-called because they were especially honoured in the city of Thespia, located near Mount Helicon, the traditional home of the Muses and their sacred fountain. Their priestesses were not only famed for their powers of prophecy, but for their vow of perpetual virginity; both make them appropriate agents for the rousing of Elizabeth.

[2] wonted accustomed, usual.

[3] convoy of his stars in terms of Renaissance astrology, the guidance of those stars which have shaped his life and character from birth.

[4] twice-born nobles In the classical tradition, "twice-born" describes those mortals who have obtained godhood. Bacchus and Hercules are the best-known examples. In Natale Conti's account of Bacchus' birth, "the God is called 'twice-mothered' ... because when [his mother] Semele died in the flame, he was snatched from the flame and sewn up in [his father's] Jove's thigh, which replaced the deceased mother's womb" (Mythologies, trans. A. DiMatteo [New York, 1994], p. 272). In the Christian tradition, "twice-born" refers to those who experience a spiritual rebirth through their belief in Jesus (John 3.1-6).

[5] Argolian fleet the fleet of Jason and the Argonauts, those heroes of Greek mythology whose most famous exploit is their quest for the Golden Fleece of Colchis (Apollodorus, Library of Greek Mythology, 1.9.16-28).

[6] bating either "baiting" in the sense of alluring or enticing, or perhaps a variant on "beating" in the sense of restless, impatient; fluttering; colours here, a flag or standard of a regiment or ship.

[7] Orenoque the Orinoco River, Guiana.

[8] fell fierce, terrible, dangerous.

[9] forward eager, zealous, ardent.

[10] Where ... them Orpheus was the son of the muse of music, Calliope, and the sun-god and god of music, Apollo. Orpheus was a singer and musician of such great power that (with a lyre given him by Apollo) he was said to be able to quiet and tame wild beasts and cause inanimate objects like trees and rocks to move. More specifically, Chapman refers to Orpheus' feat of taming the notoriously savage tribes of Thrace (Classical Dict., pp. 466-67).

[11] thriftless unprofitable, worthless, useless. The sense is either that "learned men are no longer so impoverished that they have only their books to eat," or (more literally) that "learned men no longer have to sell their books in order to eat."

[12] estridge-like i.e., ostrich-like. Proverb: "To digest iron (To have a stomach) like an ostrich" (Tilley I97). In Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (1578), Lyly remarks that "The Estrich digesteth hard iron to preserve his health."

[13] strumpet whore; prostitute; wants needs, desires.

[14] Gallic humours a reference to the popular notion that sexually-transmitted disease was a foreign, in particular, a French (i.e., Gallic) or continental disease, imported into England. For one popular aetiology of sexually-transmitted disease and its relationship to imperial expansion, see Robert Greene's Disputation Between a He Cony-Catcher and a She Cony-Catcher (p. 1012, note 1).

[15] Hymen's lights In the classical tradition, Hymen was the god of marriage. Athenian marriages concluded with an evening, torch-lit procession from the bride's house to the groom's.

[16] adamantine unbreakable.

[17] strow strew; meads meadows.

[18] Lines 163-78: for other Renaissance conceptions of utopia, see in this anthology More's Utopia (pp. 35-78). See also Shakespeare's The Tempest, 2.1.148-69; mansions place of abode or dwelling; large and stately residences; neighbourhood neighbourly feeling or conduct.

Out of the earth, and kiss th'enamored skies,
Where new Britannia,[1] humbly kneels to Heaven,
The world to her, and both at her blest feet,
In whom the circles of all empire meet.

—1596

from Achilles' Shield.

Translated as the Other Seven Books of Homer, out of His Eighteenth Book of Iliades.

By George Chapman Gent.[2]

[...]

To the Understander

You are not everybody; to you (as to one of my very few friends) I may be bold to utter my mind, nor is it more impair[3] to an honest and absolute man's sufficiency to have few friends, than to an Homerical poem to have few commenders, for neither do common dispositions keep fit or plausible consort with judicial and simple honesty, nor are idle capacities comprehensible of[4] an elaborate poem. My epistle dedicatory before my seven books is accounted dark[5] and too much laboured. For the darkness, there is nothing good or bad, hard or soft, dark or perspicuous but in respect,[6] and in respect of[7] men's light, slight, or envious perusals (to whose loose capacities any work worthily composed is knit with a riddle) and that the style is material flowing, and not rank, it may perhaps seem dark to rank riders[8] or readers that have no more souls than burbolts;[9] but to your comprehension and in itself, I know it is not. For the affected labour bestowed in it, I protest two mornings both ended it and the reader's epistle. But the truth is, my desire and strange disposition in all things I write is to set down uncommon and most profitable coherents for the time, yet further removed from abhorred affectation than from the most popular and cold digestion.[10] And I ever imagine that as Italian and French poems to our studious linguists win much of the discountreyed affection, as well because the understanding of foreign tongues is sweet to their apprehension as that the matter and invention is pleasing, so my far-fetched and, as it were, beyond-sea[11] manner of writing, if they would take as much pains for their poor countrymen as for a proud stranger when they once understand it, should be much more gracious to their choice conceits than a discourse that falls naked before them, and hath nothing but what mixeth itself with ordinary table talk. For my variety of new words, I have none inkpot,[12] I am sure you know, but such as I give passport with such authority, so significant and not ill-sounding, that if my country language were an usurer, or a man of this age speaking it, he would thank me for enriching him. Why alas will my young master, the reader, affect nothing common, and yet like nothing extraordinary? "Swaggering" is a new word amongst them, and round-headed[13] custom gives it privilege with much imitation, being created as it were by a natural prosopopeia without etymology or derivation; and why may not an elegancy authentically derived and (as I may say) of the upper house[14] be

---

1 new Britannia i.e., Guiana.

2 followed by an emblem, a clenched fist surrounded by the Latin words Contrahit Avaritia Bellum ("Greed causes war").

3 impair impairment.

4 comprehensible of i.e., able to understand.

5 dark obscure; difficult to be understood or comprehended.

6 in respect i.e., in comparison.

7 in respect of i.e., with reference to; as relates or regards; in view of.

8 rank rider a rapid or reckless rider.

9 burbolt obsolete form of "bird-bolt," a blunt-headed arrow used for shooting birds.

10 popular and cold digestion i.e. (suited to) the common and slow understanding.

11 beyond-sea outlandish, foreign.

12 inkpot bookish, pedantic.

13 round-headed Although clearly derogatory, the OED gives no meaning for the term at this early date.

14 upper house literally, a higher house of deliberation or legislation, especially the House of Lords of the British parliamentary system.

entertained[1] as well in their lower consultation with authority of art, as their own forgeries licked up by nature? All tongues have enriched themselves from their original (only the Hebrew and Greek which are not spoken amongst us) with good neighbourly borrowing, and as with infusion of fresh air, and nourishment of new blood in their still growing bodies, and why may not ours? Chaucer (by whom we will needs[2] authorize our true English) had more new words for his time than any man needs to devise now. And therefore for current wits to cry from standing brains,[3] like a brood of frogs from a ditch, to have the ceaseless flowing river of our tongue turned into their frog-pool, is a song far from their arrogation[4] of sweetness, and a sin would soon bring the plague of barbarism amongst us; which in faith needs not be hastened with defences of his ignorant furtherers,[5] since it comes with meal-mouthed toleration too savagely upon us. To be short: since I had the reward of my labours in their consummation[6] and the chief pleasure of them in mine own profit, no young prejudicate or castigatory brain[7] hath reason to think I stand trembling under the airy stroke of his fevery[8] censure, or that I did ever expect any flowing applause from his dry fingers; but the satisfaction and delight that might probably redound to[9] every true lover of virtue I set in the seat of mine own profit and contentment; and if there be anyone in whom this success is enflowered, a few sprigs of it shall be my garland.[10] Since then this never-equalled poet[11] is to be understood, and so full of government and direction to all estates: stern anger and the affrights of war bearing the main face of his subject, soldiers shall never spend their idle hours more profitably than with his studious and industrious perusal, in whose honours his deserts are infinite; counsellors have never better oracles than his lines; fathers have no morals so profitable for their children as his counsels, nor shall they ever give them more honoured injunctions than to learn Homer without book,[12] that being continually conversant with him his height may descend to their capacities and his substance prove[13] their worthiest riches; husbands, wives, lovers, friends, and allies, having in him mirrors for all their duties, all sorts of which concourse and society in other more happy ages have instead of sonnets and lascivious ballads sung his Iliades. Let the length of the verse never discourage your endeavours:[14] for talk our quidditicall Italianists of what proportion soever their strutting lips[15] affect, unless it be in these couplets, into which I have hastily translated this Shield, they shall never do Homer so much right, in any octaves, canzons, canzonets, or with whatsoever fustian epigraphs they shall entitle their measures.[16] Only the extreme false printing troubles my

[1] entertained considered.

[2] will needs are necessitated or obliged to.

[3] standing brains stagnant, sluggish, or dull intellects.

[4] arrogation the action of claiming and assuming without just reason; unwarrantable assumption.

[5] furtherers proponents, supporters.

[6] their consummation i.e., in the completion of these verses.

[7] prejudicate or castigatory brain biased or chastising/punitive intellect.

[8] fevery feverish.

[9] redound to result, attach, or accrue to (the lovers of virtue).

[10] in whom this success is enflowered … garland A laurel garland was the traditional reward or acknowledgement of poetic excellence in the classical world, and thus here Chapman makes the reaction of his elite readership that which guarantees the worth of his endeavours.

[11] this never equalled poet i.e., Homer.

[12] to learn … without book to memorize.

[13] prove turn out to be.

[14] Let the length … endeavours i.e., in fourteen syllable rhyming couplets.

[15] quidditicall an adjective invented by Chapman from the noun "quiddity"; thus, the Italianists (men who imitate the poetic genres, meters, and devices of Italian verse) are characterized as men who use subtleties or captious niceties in argument, who engage in arguments full of quibbles and trivial distinctions; Italianist one who "Italianizes" (OED cites first use as 1855, although the verb "Italianize" dates to 1611); of what proportion soever i.e., about whatever metrical or musical rhythm or harmony; strutting lips figuratively, those swelling with pride or importance; wrangling, contending.

[16] octaves a group of eight lines of verse; a poetic work in eight line stanzas; canzons songs; perhaps, more specifically, songs or lyrics, closely resembling the madrigal but less strict in style; canzonets a little or short song; fustian inflated, bombastic; using turgid or inappropriately lofty language; epigraph no appropriate OED definition which fits the context; perhaps, titles, labels, or names? measure poetical rhythms, as "measured" by quantity or accent; a kind of poetical rhythm; meter; also, an air, tune, melody.

conscience,[1] for fear of your deserved discouragement in the impair of our poet's sweetness; whose general divinity of spirit, clad in my willing labours (envious of none nor detracting any), I commit to your good nature and solid capacity.

Book 18 of Homer's Iliad

Bright-footed Thetis[2] did the sphere aspire
(Amongst th'Immortals) of the god of fire,
Starry, incorruptible, and had frame
Of ruddy brass, right shaped by the lame.
She found him at his swelling bellows sweating
And twenty tripods seriously[3] beating,
To stand and beautify his royal hall
For chairs of honour round about the wall;
And to the feet he fixed of every one
Wheels of man-making gold to run alone
To the gods' temples—to the which they were
Religious ornaments; when, standing there
Till sacrifice were done, they would retire
To Vulcan's house, which all eyes did admire.[4]
Yet the Daedalean[5] handles to hold by
Were unimposed, which straight he did apply.
These while he fashioned with miraculous art,
The fair white-footed dame appeared apart[6]
To Charis[7] with the rich-attired head,
Whose heavenly beauties strowed the nuptial bed
Of that illustrate smith. She took her hand
And entertained her with this kind demand:
"What makes the goddess with the ample train,
Reverent and friendly Thetis, entertain
Conceit to honour us with her repair,[8]
That never yet was kind in that affair?
But enter further, that so wished a guest
May be received with hospitable feast."
Thus led she Thetis to a chair of state,
Rich and exceedingly elaborate,
And set a footstool at her silver feet,
Then called her famous smith: "Vulcan, my sweet,
Thetis in some use needs thy fiery hand."
He answered: "Thetis hath a strong command
Of all my powers, who gave my life defence,
Cast by my mother's[9] wilful impudence
Out of Olympus, who would have obscured
My native lameness. Then had I endured
Unhelped griefs if on her shining breast
Hospitious Thetis had not let me rest,
And bright Eurynome,[10] my guardian,
Fair daughter of the labouring Ocean,
With whom nine years I wrought up divers things—
Buttons and bracelets, whistles, chains and rings—
In concluse[11] of a cave; and over us
The swelling waves of old Oceanus
With foamy murmur flowed, and not a god
Nor any mortal knew my close abode
But Thetis and divine Eurynome,
Who succoured me. And now from gulfy sea
To our steep house hath Thetis made ascent,

---

[1] Only … conscience J.C. Briggs argues that the work's printing errors and Chapman's apologies for them show the speed with which the work was produced, in order to capitalize on the popularity and ambitions of the earl of Essex, the nobleman to whom Chapman dedicates his translation; Chapman represents him as the "now living instance of Achileian virtues [...] whom by sacred prophecy Homer did but prefigure in his admirable object"—that is, in the Greek hero, Achilles ("Chapman's Seaven Bookes of the Iliades: Mirror for Essex," SEL 21 [1981]: p. 59; 65-66).

[2] Thetis a Nereid (sea deity), wife of King Peleus, mother of Achilles; by dipping Achilles in the River Styx in order to make him immortal, Thetis attempted to cheat the Fates who decreed that Achilles would die young.

[3] tripods three-legged stools or chairs; seriously one after another; in due sequence.

[4] admire wonder at.

[5] Daedalean after the manner of Daedalus, the classical inventor whose most famous accomplishments are the construction of the Minotaur's labyrinth, and the two pairs of wings with which he and his son Icarus escaped their imprisonment on Crete; thus, skilfully or ingeniously made.

[6] apart separately (i.e., before she appears to Vulcan).

[7] Charis one of the Graces, wife of Vulcan.

[8] entertain / Conceit to honour us with her repair i.e., consider or have the thought to honour us with her arrival.

[9] my mother's Vulcan (Greek, "Hephaestus") was the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and his wife, Juno (Hera). When Vulcan was born deformed, Juno cast him out of Olympus into the sea.

[10] Eurynome one of the Oceanides (sea nymphs, daughters of Oceanus and Tethys), mother of the Graces.

[11] concluse not in OED; from Latin, "concludo, -ere, -us," confines, enclosure.

To whom requital more than competent[1]
It fits me much my safety should repay.
Charis, do thou some sumptuous feast purvey
Whiles I my airy bellows may lay by
And all my tools of heavenly ferrary."[2]
Thus from his anvil the huge monster rose,
And with distorted knees he limping goes
To a bright chest of silver-ore composed,
Where all his wonder-working tools were closed,
And took his sighing bellows from the fire.
Then with a sponge his breast with hairs like wire,
His brawned neck, his hard hands and his face
He cleansed; put on his robe, assumed his mace,
And halted[3] forth; and on his steps attended
Handmaids of gold that with strong paces wended,
Like dames in flow'r of life, in whom were minds
Furnished with wisdom, knowing all the kinds
Of the god's powers; from whom did voices fly,
In whom were strengths and motions voluntary.
These at his elbow ever minist'red,
And these (drawing after him his legs) he led
To Thetis seated in a shining throne,
Whose hand he shook, and asked this question:
"What wished occasion brings the sea's bright queen
To Vulcan's house, that ever yet hath been
So great a stranger? Show thy reverent will,
Which mine of choice commands me to fulfil,
If in the reach of all mine art it lie
Or it be possible to satisfy?"
Thetis poured out this sad reply in tears:
"O Vulcan, is there any goddess bears
(Of all the deities that deck the sky)
So much of mortal wretchedness as I,
Whom Jove past all deprives of heavenly peace?
Myself of all the blue Nereides
He hath subjected to a mortal's bed,
Which I against my will have suffered
To Peleus, surnamed Aeacides,
Who in his court lies slain with the disease
Of woeful age; and now with new infortunes
He all my joys to discontents importunes
In giving me a son,[4] chief in renown
Of all heroes, who hath palm-like grown
Set in a fruitful soil; and, when my care
Had nursed him to a form so singulare,
I sent him in the Grecians' crook-sterned fleet
To Ilion, with the swiftness of his feet
And dreadful strength that his choice limbs indued,
To fight against the Troyan fortitude;
And him I never shall receive, retired
To Peleus' court, but while he lives inspired
With human breath and sees the sun's clear light,
He must live sad and moody as the night.
Nor can I cheer him, since his valour's prize,
Resigned by all the Grecians' compromise,
Atrides forced into his fortune's part,
For which, consumption tires upon his heart.
Yet, since the Troyans all the Greeks conclude[5]
Within their fort, the peers of Greece have sued
With worthiness of gifts and humble prayers
To win his hand to hearten their affairs;
Which he denied; but to appease their harms
He decked his dear Patroclus in his arms
And sent him with his bands to those debates.[6]
All day they fought before the Scaean gates
And well might have expugned,[7] by that black light,
The Ilian city,[8] if Apollo's spite,
Thirsting the blood of good Menaetius' son,[9]
Had not in face of all the fight foredone[10]
His faultless life and authored the renown
On Hector's prowess, making th'act his own.
Since, therefore, to revenge the timeless[11] death
Of his true friend my son determineth

---

1 competent merely adequate or satisfactory.
2 ferrary the smith's art; the art of iron-working.
3 halted walked lamely; limped.
4 a son Achilles.
5 conclude confine, shut up, enclose.
6 debates military conflicts.
7 expugned captured by fighting; taken by storm.
8 The Ilian city i.e., Troy.
9 Menaetius' son Patroclus, beloved friend of Achilles; putting on Achilles' armour, he was killed by the Trojan prince Hector.
10 in face of in defiance of; foredone killed.
11 timeless untimely; premature.

T'embrue[1] the field, for want whereof he lies
Buried in dust and drowned in miseries,
Here at thy knees I sue, that the short date[2]
Prefixed his life by power of envious[3] fate
Thou wilt with heavenly arms grace and maintain,
Since his are lost with his Patroclus slain."
He answered: "Be assured, nor let the care
Of these desires thy firmest hopes impair.
Would God as far from lamentable death,
When heavy fates shall see it with his breath,
I could reserve him, as unequalled arms
Shall be found near t'avert all instant harms,
Such arms as all worlds shall for art admire,
That by their eyes their excellence aspire."
This said, the smith did to his bellows go,
Set them to fire and made his Cyclops[4] blow.
Full twenty pair breathed through his furnace holes
All sorts of blasts t'enflame his tempered coals,
Now blustered hard and now did contrarise[5]
As Vulcan would, and, as his exercise
Might with perfection serve the dame's desire,
Hard brass and tin he cast into the fire,
High-prized gold and silver, and did set
Within the stock an anvil bright and great.
His massy hammer then his right hand held,
His other hand his gasping tongs compelled.

[...]

—1598

[1] T'embrue stain or soak with blood.

[2] date duration; length.

[3] envious full of ill-will; malicious.

[4] Cyclops a race of giants, sons of Coelus (Heaven) and Terra (Earth), each with one eye in the middle of his forehead. As Vulcan's workmen, they helped produce Jupiter's thunderbolts, Pluto's shield, and Neptune's trident.

[5] contrarise the opposite (see "contrariwise" in OED).

Appendix: Corinna's Garden— Ovid's Banquet of Sense, Stanzas 9-10.

The plants in stanzas 9-10 range from the innocuous to the dangerous and are directly related to the senses and passions of Corinna and the watching Ovid. Chapman includes some (it would seem) solely for their beauty, such as the aromatic jessamine (jasmine) and the crown-imperial, so-called after the shape of its bloom, in which one may find "six drops of the most clear shining water, in taste like sugar, resembling in show fair orient pearls" (Gerard, p. 48). Others are symbolic of various emotions, senses and physical states, many related to love, lust, and desire. Pansies and violets were both popular love tokens, with pansies traditionally representing thought or remembrance and violets faithfulness in love. The herbalist John Gerard notes that the beauty and sweet smell of the latter "stir up a man to that which is comely and honest," encouraging virtue generally (p. 198). Cupid's crimson shield is unidentified, but its name suggests another love token.

Naturally enough, many of these plants are related to the organs of sense: melanthy (melanthion, or black cumin), nightshade (black, sleepy or common nightshade), merry (black cherry), and white aphrodill (affodill [asphodel], also known as the white daffodil) were used to treat eye disorders; melanthy could also restore the sense of smell to those who had lost it, and nightshade and calaminth (calamint) were also useful in treating afflictions of the ear. Significantly, Venus' navel (pennywort, kidneywort or navelwort, [hortus Veneris: Venus' garden]), white aphrodill and violets, were also used for their cooling properties to cure inflammations, fevers, and burns. Many of Corinna's plants and herbs are purgatives, such as sya (perhaps sion or syon, the English water parsley) and melliphill (millefoil [millefolium], the English "yarrow"): these could help (for example) to break up kidney stones, cure urine retention, purify the blood, and dispel unnatural "heats." Given that love and desire were popularly believed to "heat the blood," the predominance of purgative herbs and plants in Corinna's garden is significant; nepenthe, in particular, that powerful and ancient drug mentioned by Homer and Pliny, was credited by Ferrand specifically as an opiate [nepenthe of ladanum] that could help treat cases of lovesickness or erotomania.

An interesting number of the plants here were used to treat women's diseases and disorders: Diana's arrow (perhaps artemisia or parthenium, the English mugwort) calaminth, sya, white aphrodill, and amaranth were used to treat menstrual disorders; white aphrodill was thought useful for inflammations of the breasts, and Diana's arrow, sya, and amareus were used to ease difficult labour and delivery. Diana's arrow was also used to treat hysteria and inflammations of the womb, while white aphrodill could help in cases of inflammed testicles. More ominously, perhaps, amareus was also an effective abortifacient. In fact, one of these plants falls into the category of medicines that can cure or kill: nightshade can provoke sleep, but it can also trouble the mind and cause madness, and in larger doses, it can kill. In fact Gerard recommends rooting this plant out of gardens likely to be frequented by pregnant women, to protect them against consuming it during their cravings for "things most vile" (pp. 74-75).

Finally, two were used to treat syphilis: melanthy and amaranth. Culpeper calls the latter "a most gallant anti-venereal, and a singular remedy for the French pox" (p. 9). Diana's arrow (in its English character as mugwort) was believed an effective charm against witchcraft, sorcery, poison, venomous bites, and even "the hurtful and malign aspect of the Sun" (Pliny, Natural History, vol. 2, p. 222).

Several of the plants are explicitly named in Culpeper's Herbal as being under the astrological influence of Venus, the goddess of love: violets are "a fine pleasing plant of Venus, of a mild nature, no way harmful"; Venus' navel is a plant "governed by Venus"; merry is "a tree of Venus"; and the amaranth "is under the dominion of Saturn, and is an excellent qualifier of the unruly actions and passions of Venus, though Mars also should join with her" (pp. 188, 142-43, 63, 9).[1]

[1] Sources: N. Culpeper, Culpeper's Complete Herbal and English Physician Enlarged, 1653 (Glenwood, IL, 1814); J. Ferrand, Treatise on Lovesickness, trans. and ed. D. Beecher and M. Ciavollela (Syracuse, NY, 1990); J. Gerard, Gerard's Herbal, 1636 (London, 1985); C. Robinson, "A Nosegay Always Sweet," Handful of Pleasant Delights (London, 1584); W. Turner, New Herball, 1562-1568, ed. G.T.L. Chapman (Cambridge, 1995).

John Donne
1572-1631

Both the life and work of John Donne were deeply embedded in the social, religious, and political networks of late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century England. Family history linked him to the worlds of letters and theatre, while his own aspiration to a career in civil service drove him to exploit connections to court life and patronage made available through the social milieu of the law schools in which he spent his early adult years. This world of court politics and patronage ultimately led Donne to a position of some eminence in the Church of England when he became Dean of St Paul's Cathedral in 1621. However, his path was torturous, blocked by religious politics and tactical errors like his marriage.

Donne's family was historically Roman Catholic, his father a successful London businessman who died when Donne was four years old and his mother the youngest daughter of playwright John Heywood and Joan Rastell, the niece of humanist and martyr Sir Thomas More.[1] His mother's remarriage was to a wealthy Roman Catholic doctor who was president of the Royal College of Physicians. To be Roman Catholic in the last quarter of the century was a dangerous business, for "on the one hand, as the careers of Donne's father and stepfather suggest, it was possible, if you were sufficiently circumspect or well-connected, to prosper. On the other hand, you might end up having your intestines torn out."[2] Legally, Roman Catholics could neither hold public office nor take degrees at the universities because graduates were required to swear the Oath of Supremacy. Furthermore, by a statute of 1585, refusal to attend Anglican services brought a fine of £20 per month—the equivalent of a village schoolmaster's annual salary—and those unable to pay were liable to have all of their goods and two thirds of their land confiscated.[3] Physical punishment accompanied fiscal, as it was high treason for priests to enter the country and a felony for lay people to receive them. Execution of recusants was gruesome and often followed a period of torture. Among the 100 priests and 53 lay people executed from 1585 to 1603[4] were Donne's great uncle, former monk Thomas Heywood, in 1574, and his uncle, Jesuit priest Jasper Heywood, in 1583. Donne is known to have accompanied his mother to visit his uncle in prison prior to execution,[5] so he was well aware of the dangers of his family's religious affiliation.

Donne and his brother Henry were sent to Hart Hall, Oxford, a college favoured by Roman Catholics because it had no chapel and thus made avoidance of Anglican services both easier and less noticeable. At their matriculation, the boys gave their ages as eleven and ten, although they were actually a year older.[6] Recusant families typically sent their sons to university slightly earlier than usual because the law required students at age sixteen to take the Oath of Supremacy, which acknowledged the Queen to be the head of the Church in England. It is thought that Donne may have studied at Cambridge as well, but no record of his attendance remains.[7] In 1592, he was admitted to the law school at Lincoln's Inn—another institution favoured by recusants. It was rumoured that the priests who frequented Lincoln's Inn Fields blew a special trumpet to call the Inns of Court men to mass.[8] During this period, Donne's brother Henry was caught with a priest in his room, with the result that the priest was executed and Henry charged (he died of plague while in prison awaiting trial).[9]

As a literary environment, Lincoln's Inn was rich, housing a large population of educated gentlemen interested in improving their social and economic status.[10] The Inns of Court system was originally designed to train civil servants

---

1 J. Carey, John Donne: Life, Mind and Art (Oxford, 1981), p. 15.
2 Ibid., p. 15.
3 Ibid., pp. 15-16.
4 Ibid., p. 17.
5 Ibid., p. 20.
6 Ibid., pp. 21-22.
7 Ibid., p. 22.
8 Ibid., p. 24.
9 Ibid., p. 24.
10 A. Marotti, John Donne, Coterie Poet (Madison, 1986), p. 26.

for an expanding bureaucracy, but overproduction of educated young gentlemen made prospective employment tenuous. This potential for disappointed aspiration fuelled writing critical of the very establishment the students sought to enter.[1] Donne's first four satires belong to this anxious period before achieving a position in government service, and the first two address the various routes to success available to the men of the Inns. The speaker in "Satire 1" is a moralist positioned outside the world of courtly sycophants, while "Satire 2" attacks the greed of professional lawyers and their acquisition of land that more properly belongs to the gentry. Along with the lawyers' "theft" of land goes their appropriation of courtly literary forms. However, while Donne rejects the crass verse of the lawyer, he also refuses the polite conventions of Petrarchan love poetry in favour of more direct expressions of desire.[2] In "Satire 3," religious hypocrisy becomes the target for the speaker's vitriol. Donne comes close to sedition when his speaker indirectly rejects the Elizabethan Oath of Allegiance to give conscience and divine law an authority greater than custom and human law.[3]

The majority of Donne's elegies were probably also written in the environment of the Inns of Court. The term itself refers to the meter, i.e., alternating hexameter and pentameter lines, used in Latin and Greek poems not limited to lament for the death of a person. The classical elegy is typically a complaint about love made by a speaker who attempts to entrap his mistress but ends up tricked by her instead. Donne's elegies are modelled on Ovid's Amores, but replace references to Rome with details of London and mythological allusions with gestures toward social, political, and economic realities.[4] Overall, the elegies show skepticism toward conventions of love and wooing. It has been argued that this cynicism is partly the result of the uncertain class position of men at the Inns of Court who needed to establish themselves by looking to the wealthy urban middle classes for rich wives.[5] Donne's early lyrics are similarly influenced by the world of the Inns of Court. Likely written in the period from 1592 to 160l, they show the Inns' tradition of versifying as a social activity and appear in the commonplace books of various members of the Inns of Court. The poems display wit and daring. They also cross a number of poetic styles and vocabularies, combining as they do the subject matter, conventions, and styles of courtly forms like the sonnet with the epigram and classical love lyrics of Ovid and Catullus. In Donne's work the result is a mixture of registers of language and striking boldness about sexual matters, typically argued in the form of a syllogism that is systematically undone through hair-splitting logic, verbal tricks, and paradox. Also typical is an imperative tone as the speaker attempts to assert his authority over the love object. Some of these may have been used, apparently successfully, to woo Donne's future wife, Anne More. The verse epistles addressed to Inns of Court friends, including "The Storm" and "The Calm," reflect the next stage of Donne's life, when he sailed on naval expeditions to Cadiz in 1596-97. While not particularly committed to a military career, on these voyages Donne met Thomas Egerton, through whom he garnered employment as secretary to the elder Sir Thomas Egerton, lord keeper of the Great Seal, whose association with the Earl of Essex appeared to open the next door in Donne's path to advancement.[6]

The Egerton connection also helped Donne to realize the Inns of Court fantasy of marriage to a wife of a higher class. Anne More was the third daughter of Sir George More and Donne fell in love with her when she came, at age 14, to live with her aunt, Lady Egerton.[7] Despite the 12-year age difference, the couple married in 1601 and broke the news to Sir George in early 1602. The bride's father, highly displeased, insisted that Egerton dismiss Donne. Rather than preferment, then, came ostracism from the social circles Donne sought to enter, along with severe financial instability—a set of circumstances that Donne encapsulated in his famous epigram, "John Donne, Anne Donne, undone." Both were resolved to some extent when James I came to power, for Donne gained access to court through his most generous patron, Lucy Harington, countess of Bedford. However, the King determined that Donne's route to prefer-

---

1 Ibid., p. 38.
2 Ibid., p. 41.
3 Ibid., pp. 42-43.
4 Ibid., p. 44.
5 Ibid., p. 52.
6 Carey, John Donne, pp. 67-69.
7 Marotti, John Donne, p. 133.

ment would come through the Church of England, a pressure that Donne resisted for a period of time, during which he found sporadic employment through his court connections. He finally yielded and took Anglican orders in 1615, after which he was almost immediately made King's chaplain. In 1617, Anne Donne died in childbirth and her husband then spent the rest of his life in various clerical positions, culminating in his tenure as dean of St Paul's Cathedral, during which Donne wrote his most famous religious verse.

EDITIONS: Poems by J.D. With elegies on the authors death. London: Printed by M[iles] F[lesher] for John Marriot, 1633. STC 7045; "Elegy: To His Mistress Going to Bed." Poems &c by John Donne late dean of St. Pauls, with elegies on the authors death to which is added divers copies under his own hand, never before printed. London: T.N. for Henry Herringman, 1669. Wing D1871.

Song

Go and catch a falling star,
  Get with child a mandrake root,[1]
Tell me, where all past years are,
  Or who cleft the Devil's foot,
Teach me to hear mermaids singing,[2]
  Or to keep off envy's stinging,
    And find
    What wind
Serves to advance an honest mind.

If thou be'st born to strange sights,
  Things invisible to see,
Ride ten thousand days and nights,
  Till age snow white hairs on thee,
Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
  All strange wonders that befell thee,
    And swear
    No where
Lives a woman true, and fair.

If thou find'st one, let me know,
  Such a pilgrimage were sweet,
Yet do not, I would not go,
  Though at next door we might meet,
Though she were true, when you met her,
  And last, till you write your letter,
    Yet she
    Will be
False, ere[3] I come, to two or three.

The Bait[4]

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will some new pleasures prove
Of golden sands, and crystal brooks,
With silken lines, and silver hooks.

There will the river whispering run
Warmed by thine eyes, more than the sun.
And there th'enamoured fish will stay,
Begging themselves they may betray.

When thou wilt swim in that live bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.

[1] mandrake root The mandrake is poisonous, having emetic and narcotic properties, and was formerly used medicinally. The forked root is thought to resemble the human form, and was fabled to utter a deadly shriek when plucked up from the ground. The notion indicated in the narrative of Genesis, that the fruit when eaten by women promotes conception, is said still to survive in Palestine.

[2] mermaids singing Mermaids were said to attract men with their songs and then to devour them.

[3] ere before.

[4] "The Bait" is a response to Christopher Marlowe's "The Passionate Shepherd to his Love."

If thou, to be so seen, be'st loath,[1]
By sun, or moon, thou darkenest both,
And if myself have leave to see,
I need not their light, having thee.

Let others freeze with angling reeds,
And cut their legs, with shells and weeds,
Or treacherously poor fish beset,[2]
With strangling snare, or windowy net:

Let coarse bold hands, from slimy nest
The bedded fish in banks outwrest,[3]
Or curious traitors, sleave-silk flies[4]
Bewitch poor fishes' wandering eyes.

For thee, thou need'st no such deceit,
For thou thyself art thine own bait,
That fish, that is not catched thereby,[5]
Alas, is wiser far than I.

Woman's Constancy

Now thou hast loved me one whole day,
Tomorrow when thou leav'st, what wilt thou say?
Wilt thou then antedate[6] some new made vow?
Or say that now
We are not just those persons, which we were?
Or, that oaths made in reverential fear
Of Love, and his wrath, any may forswear?[7]
Or, as true deaths, true marriages untie,
So lovers' contracts, images of those,
Bind but till sleep, death's image, them unloose?
Or, your own end to justify,
For having purposed[8] change and falsehood; you
Can have no way but falsehood to be true?

Vain lunatic, against these 'scapes[9] I could Dispute, and conquer, if I would,
Which I abstain to do,
For by tomorrow, I may think so too.

The Flea

Mark[10] but this flea, and mark in this,
How little that which thou deniest me is;
Me it sucked first, and now sucks thee,
And in this flea, our two bloods mingled be;
Thou know'st that this cannot be said
A sin, or shame, or loss of maidenhead,[11]
Yet this enjoys before it woo,
And pampered[12] swells with one blood made of two,
And this, alas, is more than we would do.

Oh stay,[13] three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost yea more than married are.
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we are met,
And cloistered[14] in these living walls of jet.[15]
Though use[16] make you apt to kill me,
Let not to that, self-murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find not thyself nor me the weaker now;
'Tis true, then learn how false fears be:
Just so much honour, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

---

1 loath reluctant, unwilling.
2 beset surround, encircle, assail.
3 outwrest extract by superior force.
4 sleave-silk flies fishing lures made of fine silk thread.
5 thereby by that means.
6 antedate affix an earlier than true date.
7 forswear abandon, renounce.
8 purposed intended, planned.
9 'scapes transgressions, breaches of conduct.
10 Mark notice, observe.
11 maidenhead virginity.
12 pampered luxuriously fed, overindulged.
13 stay stop, halt.
14 cloistered enclosed, confined.
15 jet hard, shiny, black stone (i.e., black).
16 use habit.

The Relic[1]

When my grave is broke up again
Some second guest to entertain;
(For graves have learned that womanhead
To be to more than one a bed)
And he that digs it, spies
A bracelet of bright hair about the bone,
Will he not let us alone,
And think that there a loving couple lies,
Who thought that this device be might some way
To make their souls, at the last busy day,
Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?[2]

If this fall in a time, or land,
Where mis-devotion doth command,
Then, he that digs us up, will bring
Us to the bishop and the king,
To make us relics; then
Thou shalt be Mary Magadalen, and I
A something else thereby;
All women shall adore us, and some men;
And since at such time, miracles are sought,
I would have that age by this paper taught
What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

First, we loved well and faithfully,
Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
Difference of sex no more we knew,
Than our guardian angels do;
Coming and going, we
Perchance[3] might kiss, but not between those meals;
Our hands ne'er touched the seals,[4]
Which nature, injured by late law, sets free;
These miracles we did; but now alas,
All measure, and all language, I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.

[1] Relic object belonging to saint or martyr, carefully preserved and held in esteem or veneration.
[2] stay pause.
[3] Perchance by chance.
[4] seals pieces of wax fixed on a folded letter or on a closed door to prevent opening, here with sexual connotations.

Satire I

Away thou fondling motley humourist,[5]
Leave me, and in this standing wooden chest,[6]
Consorted[7] with these few books, let me lie
In prison, and here be coffined, when I die;
Here are God's conduits,[8] grave divines;[9] and here
Nature's secretary, the philosopher;
And jolly statesmen, which teach how to tie
The sinews of a city's mystic body;[10]
Here gathering chroniclers, and by them stand
Giddy[11] fantastic[12] poets of each land.
Shall I leave all this constant company,
And follow headlong, wild uncertain thee?
First swear by thy best love in earnest
(If thou which lov'st all, canst love any best)
Thou wilt not leave me in the middle street,
Though some more spruce[13] companion thou dost meet,
Not though a captain do come in thy way
Bright parcel gilt,[14] with forty dead men's pay,
Nor though a brisk perfumed pert courtier
Deign with a nod, thy courtesy to answer.
Nor come a velvet justice with a long
Great train of blue coats,[15] twelve, or fourteen strong,
Wilt thou grin or fawn on him, or prepare
A speech to court his beauteous son and heir?
For better or worse take me, or leave me:
To take, and leave me is adultery.
O monstrous, superstitious puritan,[16]
Of refined manners, yet ceremonial man,[17]

[5] fondling motley humourist foolish changeable person given to following fads.
[6] standing wooden chest study.
[7] Consorted accompanied, associated.
[8] conduits channels, pipes.
[9] divines theologians.
[10] mystic body spiritual or symbolic being, as opposed to physical fact.
[11] Giddy mad.
[12] fantastic fanciful, capricious.
[13] spruce dapper, smart.
[14] parcel gilt partly gilded.
[15] Great train of blue coats minor officials, who typically wore blue coats.
[16] superstitious puritan overscrupulous purist.
[17] ceremonial man formal person, attached to ritual while religious puritans abhorred it.

That when thou meet'st one, with enquiring eyes
Dost search, and like a needy broker prize
The silk, and gold he wears, and to that rate
So high or low, dost raise thy formal hat:
That wilt consort none, until thou have known
What lands he hath in hope,[1] or of his own,
As though all thy companions should make thee
Jointures[2] and marry thy dear company.
Why shouldst thou (that doth not only approve,
But in rank itchy lust, desire, and love
The nakedness and barrenness to enjoy,
Of thy plump muddy whore, or prostitute boy)
Hate virtue, though she be naked, and bare?
At birth, and death, our bodies naked are;
And till our souls be unappareled
Of bodies, they from bliss are banished.
Man's first blessed state was naked, when by sin
He lost that, yet he was clothed but in beast's skin,
And in this coarse attire, which I now wear
With God, and with the Muses I confer.
But since thou like a contrite penitent,
Charitably warned of thy sins, dost repent
These vanities, and giddinesses, lo
I shut my chamber door, and come, let's go.
But sooner may a cheap whore, that hath been Worn by as many several men in sin,
As are black feathers or musk-colour hose,
Name her child's right true father, 'mongst all those:
Sooner may one guess, who shall bear away
The Infanta[3] of London, heir to an India,
And sooner may a gulling weather spy[4]
By drawing forth heaven's scheme tell certainly
What fashioned hats, or ruffs, or suits next year
Our subtle-witted antic[5] youths will wear;
Than thou, when thou depart'st from me, canst show
Whither, why, when or with whom thou wouldst go.
But how shall I be pardoned my offence
That thus have sinned against my conscience?
Now we are in the street; he first of all
Improvidently[6] proud, creeps to the wall,
And so imprisoned, and hemmed in by me
Sells for a little state his liberty;
Yet though he cannot skip forth now to greet
Every fine silken painted fool we meet,
He them to him with amorous smiles allures,
And grins, smacks, shrugs, and such an itch endures,
As 'prentices,[7] or schoolboys which do know
Of some gay sport abroad, yet dare not go.
And as fiddlers stop[8] lowest, at highest sound,
So to the most brave,[9] stoops he nigh'st the ground.
But to a grave man he doth move no more
Than the wise politic[10] horse would heretofore,[11]
Or thou, O elephant or ape, wilt do
When any names the King of Spain to you.
Now leaps he upright, jogs me, and cries, "Do you see,
Yonder well-favoured youth?" "Which?" "Oh, 'tis he
That dances so divinely." "Oh," said I,
"Stand still, must you dance here for company?"
He drooped, we went, till one (which did excel Th'Indians in drinking[12] his tobacco well)
Met us; they talked; I whispered "Let us go,
'T may be you smell him not, truly I do."
He hears not me, but, on the other side
A many-coloured peacock having spied,
Leaves him and me; I for my lost sheep stay;
He follows, overtakes, goes on the way,
Saying, "Him whom I last left, s'all repute

---

1 in hope in expectation, prospective.

2 Jointures property held jointly by husband and wife, usually in order to support the wife in widowhood.

3 Infanta Spanish princess (i.e., the daughter of a noble house who represents the best marriage prospect).

4 gulling weather spy cheating astrologer.

5 antic absurd, ludicrous.

6 Improvidently excessively.

7 'prentices apprentices.

8 stop press a string on a fret.

9 brave splendid, showy.

10 politic prudent, sagacious.

11 heretofore in time past, formerly.

12 drinking Tobacco was introduced to England by 1565, but not smoked until 1585.

For his device, in handsoming a suit,
To judge of lace, pink, panes, print, cut, and pleat,
Of all the Court, to have the best conceit."[1]
"Our dull comedians want him, let him go;
But oh, God strengthen thee, why stoop'st thou so?"
"Why? he hath travelled." "Long?" "No, but to me
(Which understand none), he doth seem to be Perfect French and Italian"; I replied,
"So is the pox."[2] He answered not, but spied
More men of sort,[3] of parts, and qualities;
At last his love he in a window spies,
And like light dew exhaled, he flings from me
Violently ravished to his lechery.
Many were there, he could command no more;
He quarrelled, fought, bled; and turned out of door,
Directly came to me hanging the head,
And constantly a while must keep his bed.

Satire III

Kind pity chokes my spleen;[4] brave scorn forbids
Those tears to issue which swell my eyelids.
I must not laugh, nor weep sins, and be wise,
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?
Is not our mistress fair religion,
As worthy of all our soul's devotion,
As virtue was to the first blinded age?[5]
Are not Heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts as earth's honour was to them? Alas,
As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in Heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be imputed faith, and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near
To follow, damned? Or if thou dar'st, fear this;
This fear great courage, and high valour is.
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch,[6] and dar'st thou lay
Thee in ships' wooden sepulchres, a prey
To leaders' rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?
Dar'st thou dive seas, and dungeons of the earth?
Hast thou courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen north discoveries?[7] and thrice
Colder than salamanders?[8] Like divine
Children in th'oven,[9] fires of Spain,[10] and the line,[11]
Whose countries limbecks[12] to our bodies be,
Canst thou for gain bear? And must every he
Which cries not, "Goddess!" to thy mistress, draw,
Or eat thy poisonous words? courage of straw!
O desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and
To thy foes and his (who made thee to stand Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for forbidden wars, leave th'appointed field?
Know thy foe: the foul Devil he's, whom thou
Strivest to please, for hate, not love, would allow Thee fain, his whole realm to be quit; and as
The world's all parts wither away and pass,
So the world's self, the other loved foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste,
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loathe.

---

1 conceit idea, conception.
2 pox syphilis, often referred to as the French or Italian pox.
3 sort rank.
4 spleen ill-humour, anger.
5 the first blinded age the age of early pagan philosophers.
6 mutinous Dutch Many mercenaries and Englishmen sympathetic to the Protestant cause helped the Dutch fight against the Spanish occupation of the Low Countries through the latter part of the sixteenth century.
7 frozen north discoveries the search for the northwest passage was a focus for exploration.
8 salamanders lizard-like creatures supposed to be able to endure, or even live in, fire.
9 divine / Children in th'oven Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who refused to worship a golden statue erected by Nebuchadnezzar, were tossed into a furnace, but were seen walking in the flames and returned unscorched (Daniel 3:12-97).
10 fires of Spain The Inquisition consigned heretics to death by burning.
11 line the Equator.
12 limbecks alembics, apparatuses used for distilling and, in alchemy, for heating base metals in order to turn them to gold.

Seek true religion, Oh where? Mirreus,
Thinking her unhoused here, and fled from us,
Seeks her at Rome; there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago,
He loves the rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth[1] where the prince sat yesterday.
Crantz to such brave loves will not be enthralled,
But loves her only, who at Geneva is called Religion plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome. As among
Lecherous humours, there is one that judges
No wenches wholesome but coarse country drudges:
Graius stays still at home here, and because
Some preachers, vile ambitious bawds, and laws
Still new, like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us is only perfect, he Embraceth her, whom his godfathers will Tender to him, being tender, as wards still Take such wives, as their guardians offer, or Pay values.[2] Careless Phrygius doth abhor
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
Gracchus[3] loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in divers[4] countries go
In divers habits, yet are still one kind,
So doth, so is religion; and this blindness too much light breeds; but unmoved thou
Of force must one, and forced but one allow;
And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.
To adore or scorn an image, or protest,
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is. On a huge hill,
Cragged and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about must, and about must go;
And what the hill's suddenness resists, win so;
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night,
To will, implies delay, therefore now do
Hard deeds, the body's pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavours reach, and mysteries
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to all eyes.
Keep the truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
In so ill case here, that God hath with his hand
Signed kings' blank charters[5] to kill whom they hate,
Nor are they vicars,[6] but hangmen to Fate.
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
At the Last Day? Will it then boot[7] thee
To say a Philip,[8] or a Gregory,[9]
A Harry,[10] or a Martin[11] taught thee this?
Is not this excuse for mere contraries
Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?
That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;
Those past, her nature and name is changed; to be
Then humble to her is idolatry;
As streams are, power is; those blessed flowers that dwell
At the rough stream's calm head thrive and prove well,
But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas, are driven

[1] statecloth canopy over a throne or chair of state.

[2] values fines.

[3] Mirreus … Gracchus figures representing a variety of religious beliefs, from Roman Catholic through austere Genevan Protestant to relativistic acceptance of all religions as equal.

[4] divers various, sundry.

[5] charters permissions, pardons.

[6] vicars ones who take the place of, or act instead of others, typically in an ecclesiastical sense.

[7] boot profit.

[8] Philip Philip II of Spain (1527-98), a ruthless suppressor of Lutheranism.

[9] Gregory Pope Gregory XIV (1535-91), who assisted attempts to depose the Protestant king of France, Henry IV.

[10] Harry Henry VIII (1491-1547), who founded the English Church and declared himself its head.

[11] Martin Martin Luther (1483-1546), whose 95 Theses sparked debate that led to the development of Protestantism.

Through mills, and rocks, and woods and at last, almost Consumed in going, in the sea are lost:
So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
Power from God claimed, than God himself to trust.

Elegy 1: Jealousy

Fond woman, which wouldst have thy husband die,
And yet complain'st of his great jealousy;
If swollen with poison, he lay in his last bed,
His body with a sere-bark[1] covered,
Drawing his breath, as thick and short, as can
The nimblest crotcheting[2] musician,
Ready with loathsome vomiting to spew
His soul out of one hell, into a new,
Made deaf with his poor kindred's howling cries,
Begging with few feigned tears, great legacies,
Thou wouldst not weep, but jolly and frolic[3] be,
As a slave, which tomorrow should be free;
Yet weep'st thou, when thou see'st him hungrily
Swallow his own death, heart's-bane jealousy.
Oh give him many thanks, he is courteous,
That in suspecting kindly warneth us.
We must not, as we used, flout openly,
In scoffing riddles, his deformity;
Nor at his board together being sat,
With words, nor touch, scarce looks adulterate.
Nor when he swollen, and pampered with great fare,
Sits down, and snorts, caged in his basket chair,[4]
Must we usurp his own bed any more,
Nor kiss and play in his house, as before.
Now I see many dangers; for that is
His realm, his castle, and his diocese.
But if, as envious men which would revile
Their prince, or coin his gold, themselves exile
Into another country, and do it there,
We play in another house, what should we fear?
There we will scorn his household policies,
His silly plots, and pensionary[5] spies,
As the inhabitants of Thames' right side
Do London's mayor,[6] or Germans, the Pope's pride.[7]

Elegy 8: The Comparison[8]

As the sweet sweat of roses in a still,
As that which from chafed musk cat's pores[9] doth trill,
As the almighty balm of th'early east,
Such are the sweet drops of my mistress' breast.
And on her neck her skin such lustre sets,
They seem no sweat drops, but pearl carcanets.[10]
Rank sweaty froth thy mistress's brow defiles,
Like spermatic issue of ripe menstruous boils.
Or like the scum, which, by need's lawless law
Enforced, Sanserra's starved men[11] did draw
From parboiled shoes and boots, and all the rest
Which were with any sovereign fatness blessed,
And like vile stones lying in saffroned tin,[12]
Or warts, or weals, they hang upon her skin.
Round as the world's her head, on every side,

---

1 sere-bark dry, crusted skin.

2 crotcheting subdividing long notes into a series of shorter, quicker ones.

3 frolic merry, mirthful.

4 basket chair wicker chair.

5 pensionary hired, paid.

6 inhabitants … London's mayor Southwark, on the south side of the Thames and nominally under the control of the city of London, was notoriously unruly.

7 Germans, the Pope's pride Germany, as Luther's birthplace, staunchly resisted the Pope.

8 This elegy is variously numbered in standard editions of Donne's work. In J. Carey's 1990 edition for the Oxford Authors series it is "Elegy 14"; in D.R. Dickson's 2007 Norton Critical Edition it is "Elegy 2."

9 musk cat's pores The civet secretes a musky substance from its anal glands that is used to make perfume.

10 carcanets ornamental collar, necklace, or tiara.

11 Sanserra's starved men For seven months in 1573 Protestants at Sancerre resisted a siege by the army of Charles IX and were forced to eat rats, mice, skins of animals, and ultimately objects like shoes, harnesses, and book bindings in order to survive. Their stoic resistance became legendary.

12 saffroned tin settings for fake jewellery made of gold-coloured metal.

Like to the fatal ball which fell on Ide,[1]
Or that whereof God had such jealousy,[2]
As for the ravishing thereof we die.
Thy head is like a rough-hewn statue of jet,[3]
Where marks for eyes, nose, mouth, are yet scarce set;
Like the first Chaos, or flat seeming face
Of Cynthia,[4] when the earth shadows her embrace.
Like Proserpine's white beauty-keeping chest,[5]
Or Jove's best fortune's urn,[6] is her fair breast.
Thine's like worm-eaten trunks,[7] clothed in seal's skin,
Or grave, that's dust without, and stink within.
And like that slender stalk, at whose end stands
The woodbine[8] quivering, are her arms and hands,
Like rough-barked elmboughs or the russet[9] skin
Of men late scourged for madness, or for sin,
Like sun-parched quarters on the city gate,
Such is thy[10] tanned skin's lamentable state.
And like a bunch of ragged carrots stand
The short swoll'n fingers of her gouty hand.
Then like the chemic's masculine equal fire,
Which in the limbeck's warm womb[11] doth inspire
Into th'earth's worthless dirt a soul of gold,
Such cherishing heat her best loved part doth hold.

Thine's like the dread mouth of a fired gun,
Or like hot liquid metals newly run
Into clay moulds, or like to that Aetna,[12]
Where round about the grass is burnt away.
Are not your kisses then as filthy, and more,
As a worm sucking an envenomed sore
Doth not thy fearful hand in feeling quake,
As one which gathering flowers, still fears a snake?
Is not your last act harsh, and violent,
As where a plough a stony ground doth rent?
So kiss good turtles,[13] so devoutly nice
Are priests in handling reverent sacrifice,
And such in searching wounds the surgeon is
As we, when we embrace, or touch, or kiss.
Leave her, and I will leave comparing thus,
She, and comparisons, are odious.

Elegy 19: To His Mistress Going to Bed[14]

Come, Madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
Until I labour, I in labour lie.
The foe oft-times, having the foe in sight,
Is tired of standing, though he never fight.
Off with that girdle,[15] like heaven's zone glistering,
But a far fairer world encompassing.
Unpin that spangled breast-plate,[16] which you wear,
That th'eyes of busy fools may be stopped there.
Unlace yourself, for that harmonious chime
Tells me from you, that now it is your bed time.
Off with that happy busk,[17] which I envy
That still can be, and still can stand so nigh.
Your gown's going off such beauteous state reveals

[1] Ide Mount Ida, where Eris (discord) dropped a golden ball labelled "for the fairest." The resulting competition led to the Trojan war (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[2] that whereof ... jealousy the apple from the Tree of Knowledge that brought about the fall of Adam and Eve.

[3] jet hard, shiny, black stone.

[4] Cynthia goddess of the moon (i.e., the moon).

[5] Proserpine's white beauty-keeping chest Psyche, in search of her lost lover Cupid, had to get a jar containing beauty from the goddess of the underworld (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[6] Jove's best fortune's urn In Jove's palace stand two urns, one of good gifts and the other of bad. Their proportions in the mix Jove prepares determines a person's fortune (Iliad, Book 24).

[7] worm-eaten trunks i.e., coffins.

[8] woodbine a climbing plant.

[9] russet reddened.

[10] thy i.e., thy mistress's.

[11] limbeck's warm womb An alembic, a round-bodied flask, was used for distilling and, in alchemy, for heating base metals in order to turn them to gold.

[12] Aetna volcano in Sicily, whose first eruption in 475 BCE was recorded by Pliny and Aeschylus.

[13] turtles turtledoves, noted for their affection for their mates.

[14] This elegy is variously numbered in standard editions of Donne's work. In J. Carey's edition for the Oxford Authors series it is "Elegy 2"; in D.R. Dickson's Norton Critical Edition it is "Elegy 8."

[15] girdle sash, belt.

[16] breast-plate Also called a 'stomacher,' a breastplate was an ornamental breast covering, often decorated with jewels or embroidery, and worn just underneath the lacings of a gown's bodice.

[17] busk corset.

As when from flowery meads[1] th' hills shadow steals.
Off with that wiry coronet and show
The hairy diadem which on you doth grow.
Now off with those shoes, and then softly tread
In this love's hallowed temple, this soft bed.
In such white robes Heaven's angels used to be Received by men; thou, angel, bring'st with thee
A heavenly Mahomet's Paradise;[2] and though
Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know
By this these angels from an evil sprite:
They set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
Licence my roving hands, and let them go
Behind, before, above, between, below.
O my America, my new found land,
My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned,
My mine of precious stones, my empery,[3]
How blest am I in this discovering thee.
To enter in these bonds, is to be free,
Then where my hand is set, my seal shall be.
Full nakedness, all joys are due to thee.
As souls unbodied, bodies unclothed must be
To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use
Are as Atalanta's balls,[4] cast in men's views,
That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem
His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them.
Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings, made
For laymen, are all women thus arrayed;
Themselves are only mystic books, which we
Whom their imputed grace[5] will dignify
Must see revealed. Then, since I may know,
As liberally as to a midwife show
Thyself; cast all, yea, this white linen hence,
There is no penance, due to innocence.
To teach thee, I am naked first; why then
What need'st thou have more covering than a man?

The Storm[6]

TO MR. CHRISTOPHER BROOKE[7]

Thou which art I,[8] ('tis nothing to be so)
Thou which art still thyself, by this shalt know
Part of our passage; and, a hand, or eye
By Hilliard[9] drawn, is worth an history,
By a worse painter made, and (without pride)
When by thy judgment they are dignified,
My lines are such. 'Tis the pre-eminence
Of friendship only to impute[10] excellence.
England, to whom we owe what we be, and have,
Sad that her sons did seek a foreign grave
(For, Fate's, or Fortune's drifts none can sooth-say, Honour and misery have one face and way)
From out her pregnant entrails sighed a wind
Which at the air's middle marble room[11] did find
Such strong resistance, that itself it threw
Downward again; and so when it did view
How in the port, our fleet dear time did leese,[12]
Withering like prisoners, which lie but for fees,[13]
Mildly it kissed our sails, and, fresh and sweet,

---

1 meads meadows.

2 Mahomet's Paradise sensual heaven.

3 empery territory ruled by an emperor.

4 Atalanta's balls Atalanta, a famous huntress, was promised in marriage to the man who could beat her in a footrace, while failure to win resulted in the man's death. She was finally beaten when a suitor, Hippomenes, rolled golden apples off the course and she stopped to pick them up (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

5 imputed grace Calvinist doctrine, in which grace is given to a few elect souls in order to save them. It emphasizes the idea that humans cannot, through their own actions, achieve grace.

6 The Storm In 1597, Donne took part in an expedition of the Earl of Essex and Sir Walter Ralegh against the Spaniards in the Azores. This verse letter describes incidents on the voyage, when ten ships left Plymouth, but were beaten back by a storm after only a few days.

7 Mr. Chrisopher Brooke (c. 1570-1628), one of Donne's closest friends from Lincoln's Inn.

8 Thou which art I a reference to the classical conviction, most powerfully expressed in Cicero's Laelius: On Friendship, that true friends are one soul in two bodies.

9 Hilliard Nicholas Hilliard (1547-1619), a notable miniaturist who painted portraits of many members of Elizabeth I's court.

10 impute attribute.

11 air's middle marble room The middle region of the air was thought to be intensely cold, possibly frozen solid.

12 leese lose.

13 fees jailor's fees, required for release of prisoners at the end of a term of incarceration.

As to a stomach, starved, whose insides meet,
Meat comes, it came, and swole[1] our sails, when we
So joyed, as Sarah[2] her swelling joyed to see.
But 'twas but so kind, as our countrymen,
Which bring friends one day's way and leave them then.
Then like two mighty kings, which dwelling far
Asunder, meet against a third to war,
The south and west winds joined and, as they blew,
Waves like a rolling trench before them threw.
Sooner than you read this line, did the gale,
Like shot, not feared till felt, our sails assail;
And what at first was called a gust, the same
Hath now a storm's, anon a tempest's name.
Jonas,[3] I pity thee and curse those men,
Who when the storm raged most, did wake thee then;
Sleep is pain's easiest salve, and doth fulfil
All offices of death, except to kill.
But when I awaked, I saw, that I saw not.
I, and the sun, which should teach me, had forgot
East, west, day, night, and I could only say,
If the world had lasted, yet it had been day.
Thousands our noises were, yet we 'mongst all
Could none by his right name, but thunder call.
Lightning was all our light, and it rained more
Than if the sun had drunk the sea before.
Some coffined in their cabins lie, equally
Grieved that they are not dead, and yet must die.
And as sin-burdened souls from grave will creep,
At the Last Day, some forth their cabins peep:
And trembling ask what news, and do hear so,
As jealous husbands, what they would not know.
Some sitting on the hatches, would seem there,
With hideous gazing to fear away fear.
Then note they the ship's sicknesses, the mast
Shaked with an ague,[4] and the hold and waist[5]
With a salt dropsy[6] clogged, and all our tacklings
Snapping, like too high stretched treble strings.[7]
And from our tottered sails, rags drop down so,
As from one hanged in chains, a year ago.
Even our ordnance[8] placed for our defence,
Strive to break loose, and 'scape away from thence.
Pumping hath tired our men, and what's the gain?
Seas into seas thrown, we suck in again;
Hearing hath deafed our sailors; and if they Knew how to hear, there's none knows what to say.
Compared to these storms, death is but a qualm,
Hell somewhat lightsome, the Bermuda calm.[9]
Darkness, light's elder brother, his birth-right
Claims o'er this world, and to heaven hath chased light.
All things are one, and that one none can be,
Since all forms, uniform deformity
Doth cover, so that we, except God say
Another Fiat,[10] shall have no more day.
So violent, yet long these furies be,
That though thine absence starve me, I wish not thee.

The Calm[11]

Our storm is past, and that storm's tyrannous rage,
A stupid calm, but nothing it, doth 'suage.[12]
The fable is inverted, and far more

[1] swole swelled.

[2] Sarah wife of Abraham, who, ninety years old and childless, laughed when she found herself pregnant with Isaac (Genesis 18:12).

[3] Jonas Jonah, afraid of God's command that he was to go as a prophet to Nineveh, tried to escape by ship to Tarshish. God sent a huge storm, during which the terrified sailors woke Jonah in order to search for its cause (Jonah 1:4-6).

[4] ague violent fever or any fit of shaking.

[5] waist middle part of the upper deck of a ship.

[6] dropsy accumulation of water.

[7] treble strings thin, high strings on a stringed instrument.

[8] ordnance weapons, artillery.

[9] Bermuda calm The ocean around Bermuda was known for its storms and unpredictability.

[10] Fiat "Let there be light," God's words that speak the universe into existence in Genesis 1:3.

[11] The Calm The English fleet was split on the voyage to the Azores in 1597 and part of it was becalmed for several days, which prevented Ralegh's squadron from reconnecting with Essex's in an attack on the Spanish (Carey, John Donne, pp. 67-68).

[12] 'suage assuage.

A block afflicts, now, than a stork[1] before.
Storms chafe, and soon wear out themselves, or us;
In calms, heaven laughs to see us languish thus.
As steady as I can wish, that my thoughts were,
Smooth as thy mistress' glass, or what shines there,
The sea is now, and as the isles which we Seek, when we can move, our ships rooted be.
As water did in storms, now pitch runs out
As lead, when a fired church becomes one spout.
And all our beauty, and our trim, decays,
Like courts removing, or like ended plays.
The fighting place now seamen's rags supply;
And all the tackling is a frippery.[2]
No use of lanthorns;[3] and in one place lay
Feathers and dust, today and yesterday.
Earth's hollownesses, which the world's lungs are,
Have no more wind than the upper vault of air.
We can nor lost friends, nor[4] sought foes recover,
But meteorlike, save that we move not, hover.
Only the calenture[5] together draws
Dear friends which meet dead in great fishes' jaws.
And on the hatches as on altars lies
Each one, his own priest, and own sacrifice.
Who live, that miracle do multiply
Where walkers in hot ovens,[6] do not die.
If in despite of these, we swim, that hath
No more refreshing, than a brimstone[7] bath,
But from the sea, into the ship we turn,
Like parboiled wretches, on the coals to burn.
Like Bajazet encaged,[8] the shepherd's scoff,
Or like slack sinewed Samson,[9] his hair off,
Languish our ships. Now, as a myriad
Of ants, durst th'Emperor's loved snake[10] invade,
The crawling galleys, sea-gaols,[11] finny chips,
Might brave our pinnaces,[12] now bed-rid ships.
Whether a rotten state, and hope of gain,
Or to disuse me from the queasy pain
Of being beloved, and loving, or the thirst
Of honour, or fair death, out pushed me first,
I lose my end: for here as well as I
A desperate may live, and coward die.
Stag, dog and all which from, or towards, flies
Is paid with life, or prey, or doing dies.
Fate grudges us all, and doth subtly lay
A scourge,[13] 'gainst which we all forget to pray,
He that at sea prays for more wind, as well
Under the poles may beg cold, heat in hell.
What are we then? How little more, alas,
Is man now, than before he was? he was Nothing; for us, we are for nothing fit;
Chance, or ourselves still disproportion it.
We have no power, no will, no sense; I lie,
I should not then thus feel this misery.

To Sir Henry Wotton

Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls;
For, thus friends absent speak. This ease controls
The tediousness of my life: but for these

[1] fable … stork In Aesop's fable of the frogs who desired a king, Jove grants the frogs their request by appointing a log to rule them. The frogs, frustrated by the log's inertia, repeated their request and were granted a stork as their new king. The stork immediately proceeded to eat them up.

[2] frippery shop of cast-off, tattered garments.

[3] lanthorns lanterns.

[4] nor … nor neither ... nor.

[5] calenture disease incident to sailors within the tropics, characterized by delirium in which the patient, it is said, fancies the sea to be green fields, and desires to leap into it.

[6] walkers in hot ovens See p. 1200, note 9.

[7] brimstone sulphur.

[8] Bajazet encaged Beyazid II (c. 1354-1403) was sultan of the Ottoman empire. When he was finally captured by a Mongol warlord, he was kept chained in a cage as a trophy. The allusion here is to Marlowe's version of the story, in which Tambourlaine, a Scythian shepherd, conquers the sultan.

[9] Samson Old Testament hero whose fantastic strength derived from his long hair, which was cut off by the treacherous Delilah in order to enable his capture by the Philistines (Judges 16).

[10] th'Emperor's loved snake Emperor Tiberius (42 BCE-37 CE) had a pet snake, whom he found half-eaten by ants one morning, an omen of his own fate if he failed to recognize the power of the people.

[11] sea-gaols galleys rowed by prisoners who were chained to their oars.

[12] pinnaces small sailing vessels often used as scouts or messengers for larger ships.

[13] scourge calamity.

I could ideate[1] nothing, which could please,
But I should wither in one day, and pass
To a bottle of hay,[2] that am a lock of grass.
Life is a voyage, and in our life's ways
Countries, courts, towns are rocks or remoras;[3]
They break or stop all ships, yet our state's such,
That though than pitch they stain worse, we must touch.
If in the furnace of the raging line,
Or under th'adverse icy pole thou pine,
Thou know'st two temperate regions girded in,
Dwell there: But oh what refuge canst thou win
Parched in the court, and in the country frozen?
Shall cities, built of both extremes, be chosen?
Can dung or garlic be perfume? or can
A scorpion, or torpedo[4] cure a man?
Cities are worst of all three; of all three (O knotty riddle) each is worst equally.
Cities are sepulchres; they who dwell there
Are carcasses, as if none such they were.
And courts are theatres, where some men play
Princes, some slaves, all to one end, of one clay.
The country is a desert, where the good,
Gained (inhabits not) is understood.
There men become beasts, and prone to all evils;
In cities, blocks, and in a lewd court, devils.
As in the first chaos confusedly
Each element's qualities were in the other three;
So pride, lust, covetise, being several
To these three places, yet all are in all,
And mingled thus, their issue is incestuous.
Falsehood is denizened.[5] Virtue is barbarous.
Let no man say there, "Virtue's flinty wall
Shall lock vice in me, I'll do none, but know all."
Men are sponges, which to pour out, receive;
For in best understandings sin began,
Angels sinned first, then devils, and then man.
Only perchance beasts sin not; wretched we
Are beasts in all but white integrity.

I think if men, which in these places live,
Durst look for themselves, and themselves retrieve,
They would like strangers greet themselves, seeing then
Utopian youth, grown old Italian.[6]
Be then thine own home, and thyself dwell;
Inn[7] anywhere, continuance maketh hell.
And seeing the snail, which everywhere doth roam,
Carrying his own house still, still is at home,
Follow (for he is easy paced) this snail;
Be thine own palace, or the world's thy gaol.
And in the world's sea, do not like cork sleep
Upon the water's face; nor in the deep Sink like a lead without a line; but as
Fishes glide, leaving no print where they pass,
Nor making sound; so closely thy course go,
Let men dispute, whether thou breathe, or no.
Only in this one thing be no Galenist.[8] To make Courts' hot ambitions wholesome, do not take
A dram of country's dullness; do not add
Correctives, but, as chemics,[9] purge the bad.
But, sir, I advise not you; I rather do
Say o'er those lessons, which I learnt of you:
Whom, free from Germany's schisms, and lightness
Of France, and fair Italy's faithlessness,
Having from these sucked all they had of worth,
And brought home that faith which you carried forth,
I throughly[10] love. But if myself, I have won
To know my rules, I have, and you have Donne.

---

1 ideate conceive, imagine.

2 bottle of hay bundle of hay or straw.

3 remoras sucking-fish, believed to have the power of staying the course of any ship to which it attached itself.

4 torpedo fish with the ability to emit a numbing electric charge.

5 denizened naturalized.

6 old Italian Italy was understood to be a place of vice and licence.

7 Inn a verb, meaning "stay or live temporarily," as in an inn or hostel.

8 Galenist pracititioner of medicine based on the correction of excess of one bodily humour with its opposite in order to restore balance.

9 chemics alchemists.

10 throughly thoroughly.

Sappho to Philaenis[1]

Where is that holy fire, which verse is said
To have? is that enchanting force decayed?
Verse that draws nature's works, from nature's law,
Thee, her best work, to her work cannot draw.
Have my tears quenched my old poetic fire?
Why quenched they not as well that of desire?
Thoughts, my mind's creatures, often are with thee,
But I, their maker, want their liberty.
Only thine image, in my heart, doth sit,
But that is wax, and fires environ[2] it.
My fires have driven, thine have drawn it hence;
And I am robbed of picture, heart, and sense.
Dwells with me still mine irksome memory,
Which, both to keep, and lose, grieves equally.
That tells me how fair thou art: thou art so fair,
As gods, when gods to thee I do compare,
Are graced thereby; and to make blind men see,
What things gods are, I say they are like to thee.
For, if we justly call each silly man
A little world, what shall we call thee then?
Thou are not soft, and clear, and straight, and fair,
As down, as stars, cedars, and lilies are,
But thy right hand, and cheek, and eye only
Are like thy other hand, and cheek, and eye.
Such was my Phao[3] awhile, but shall be never,
As thou wast, art, and, oh, mayst thou be ever.
Here lovers swear in their idolatry,
That I am such; but grief discolours me.
And yet I grieve the less, lest grief remove
My beauty, and make me unworthy of thy love.
Plays some soft boy with thee, oh there wants yet
A mutual feeling which should sweeten it.
His chin, a thorny hairy unevenness
Doth threaten, and some daily change possess.
Thy body is a natural paradise,
In whose self, unmanured, all pleasure lies,
Nor needs perfection; why should'st thou then
Admit the tillage[4] of a harsh rough man?
Men leave behind them that which their sin shows,
And are, as thieves traced, which rob when it snows.
But of our dalliance no more signs there are,
Than fishes live in streams, or birds in air.
And between us all sweetness may be had;
All, all that Nature yields, or Art can add.
My two lips, eyes, thighs, differ from thy two,
But so, as thine from one another do;
And, oh, no more, the likeness being such,
Why should they not alike in all parts touch?
Hand to strange hand, lip to lip, none denies;
Why should they breast to breast, or thighs to thighs?
Likeness begets such strange self flattery,
That touching myself, all seems done to thee.
Myself I embrace, and mine own hands I kiss,
And amorously thank myself for this.
Me, in my glass, I call thee; but, alas,
When I would kiss, tears dim mine eyes and glass.
Oh, cure this loving madness, and restore,
Me to me; thee, my half, my all, my more.
So may thy cheeks' red outwear scarlet dye,
And their white, whiteness of the galaxy,
So may thy mighty, amazing beauty move
Envy in all women, and in all men love,
And so be change, and sickness, far from thee,
As thou by coming near, keep'st them from me.

—composed, 1592-1601?; published 1633, 1669

[1] Sappho to Philaenis Sappho was a seventh-century BCE lyric love poet from Lesbos noted for her lesboerotic poetry. In Heroides XV (Sappho Phaoni), Ovid adopts the voice of Sappho in a witty erotic poem to her lover (OCD).

[2] environ surround.

[3] Phao an apocryphal story says that Sappho threw herself into the sea for love of Phaon (OCD).

[4] tillage cultivation, plowing.

John Marston
1576-1634

John Marston was one of many poets to write satirical verses and plays, and occasionally suffered the hostility of critics and other writers for his outspoken censure and his often blunt and bawdy language. He had a lengthy battle of wits with Joseph Hall, another satirist, and Marston and Ben Jonson pilloried each other in a number of plays. Despite this discord, Marston, Jonson, and George Chapman co-wrote Eastward Ho! (1605), a play whose offensive passages sent Jonson and Chapman, and possibly Marston, briefly to prison. A collection of verse satires, The Scourge of Villany appeared in 1598 and went through two further editions in 1599. The revised Scourge included eleven satires on various corruptions and hypocrisies. The final satire from the Scourge, "Humours" (excerpted below), addresses a number of self-righteous, self-seeking, and hollow characters. Marston's epilogue "To Him that hath Perused Me" states that he is writing general satire, not criticism of particular individuals, but a number of the fictional characters have been connected to specific writers. Despite the reforming spirit of Marston's satire, Scourge was one of many satirical writings burnt as a result of the Archbishop of Canterbury's 1599 edict against books of a satirical or indecent nature. In 1609, Marston was ordained a minister of the Church of England, a position which no doubt enabled him to continue his censure of human vices and follies.

EDITION: The scourge of villanie corrected, with the addition of newe satyres. London: Printed by J[ames] R[oberts], 1599. STC 17486.

from The Scourge of Villainy

Satyre X
Humours[1]

Sleep grim Reproof, my jocond Muse doth sing
In other keys, to nimbler fingering.
Dull sprighted Melancholy, leave my brain;
To hell Cimerian[2] night; in lively vein
I strive to paint; then hence all dark intent
And sullen frowns; come sporting merriment,
Cheek dimpling laughter, crown my very soul
With jouisance, whilst mirthful jests control
The gouty humours of these pride-swolne days,
Which I do long[3] until my pen displays.

Oh I am great with mirth, some midwifrey,
Or I shall break my sides[4] at vanity.

[...]

But room for Tuscus, that jest-mounging[5] youth,
Who ne're did ope his apish gerning[6] mouth
But to retail and broke[7] another's wit.
Discourse of what you will, he straight can fit
Your present talk, with, "Sir, I'll tell a jest,"
(Of some sweet lady, or grand lord at least)
Then on he goes. And ne're his tongue shall lie[8]
Till his engrossed[9] jests are all drawn dry;

[1] In ancient and medieval physiology, the humours were based on four chief fluids of the body: blood, phlegm, choler, and black choler or melancholy. The proportion of these influenced a person's physical and mental qualities; an imbalance of black choler could lead to a melancholic humour (line 3).

[2] Cimerian The Cimmerians were a people fabled to live in perpetual darkness.

[3] Which I do long i.e., long for.

[4] break my sides break his sides with laughter.

[5] But room The speaker calls out a number of times to "make room" for the characters he introduces, as if clearing a space in the crowd; Tuscus Marston gives classical, ancient names to a number of his fictional characters. Some may refer to specific individuals, but most appear to refer to "types"; jest-mounging jest-mongering, or selling jokes.

[6] gerning grinning or grumbling.

[7] broke bargain, sell.

[8] lie rest or stop.

[9] engrossed swollen, but "engrossed" is also a technical term for buying goods wholesale for the purpose of selling at a monopoly price.

But then as dumb as Maurus, when at play
H'ath lost his crowns, and pawned his trim array.
He doth naught but retail jests; break but one,
Out flies his table-book;[1] let him alone,
He'll have't i-faith. Lad, hast an epigram,
Wilt have it put into the chaps[2] of fame?
Give Tuscus copies: sooth as his own wit
His proper issue he will father it.
Oh that this echo, that doth speak, spet,[3] write
Naught but the excrements of others' spright,
This ill-stuffed trunk of jests, whose very soul
Is but a heap of jibes, should once enroll
His name mong creatures termed rational,
Whose chief repute, whose sense, whose soul and all
Are fed with offal scraps, that sometimes fall
From liberal wits, in their large festival.

[...]

"Hush, hush," cries honest Phylo, "peace, desist,
Doost thou not tremble, sour satirist,
Now judicial Musus[4] readeth thee?
He'll whip each line, he'll scourge thy balladry,
Good faith he will." Phylo, I prithee stay
Whilst I the humour of this dog display:
He's naught but censure, wilt thou credit me,
He never wrote one line in poesy,
But once at Athens in a theme did frame
A paradox in praise of Virtue's name,
Which still he hugs, and lulls as tenderly
As cuckold[5] Tisus his wife's bastardy.
Well, here's a challenge, I flatly say he lies
That heard him ought but censure poesies.
'Tis his discourse, first having knit the brow,
Stroke up his fore-top,[6] champing[7] every row,
Belcheth his slavering censure on each book
That dare presume even on Medusa[8] look.
I have no artist's skill in symphonies,
Yet when some pleasing Diapason[9] flies
From out the belly of a sweet touch'd lute,
My ears dare say 'tis good: or when they suit
Some harsher sevens[10] for variety,
My native skill discerns it presently.
What then? will any sottish dolt repute
Or ever think me Orpheus[11] absolute?
Shall all the world of fiddlers follow me,
Relying on my voice[12] in musickry?
Musus, here's Rhodes, let's see thy boasted leap,[13]
Or else avaunt,[14] lewd cur, presume not speak,
Or with thy venom-sputtering chaps to bark
Gainst well-penned poems, in the tongue-tied dark.
Oh for a humour, look who yon doth go,
The meager lecher, lewd Luxurio,
'Tis he that hath the sole monopoly
By patent, of the suburb[15] lechery.
No new edition of drabs[16] comes out,
But seen and allow'd[17] by Luxurio's snout.
Did ever any man e'er hear him talk
But of Pick-hatch, or of some Shoreditch balk,[18]
Aretine's filth,[19] or of his wandring whore,

---

1 table-book a commonplace-book or copybook.

2 chaps mouth, jaws.

3 spet spit.

4 Musus Musus may refer to satirist Joseph Hall, with whom Marston was at verbal war.

5 cuckold a derisive name for the husband of an unfaithful wife.

6 fore-top lock of hair at the front of the head.

7 champing chewing vigorously.

8 Medusa Medusa was a Gorgon who could turn to stone anyone who looked at her.

9 Diapason Diapason indicates consonance or harmony.

10 sevens A seventh in music is a note seven degrees above or below a given note; here it is dissonant.

11 Orpheus In Greek mythology, Orpheus was a quintessential singer, able to enchant even trees and stones with his musical skill; he is also associated with poetry.

12 voice perhaps, "singing voice," but also "critical judgement."

13 In Aesop's Fables, a traveller boasts he outleapt everyone while at Rhodes; he is asked to demonstrate it.

14 avaunt "boast," but also "begone!"

15 suburb The brothels were situated in the suburbs of London to circumvent the city laws.

16 drabs prostitutes.

17 seen and allow'd The phrase "seen and allowed" was used when giving permission to print.

18 Pick-hatch and Shoreditch were areas known as haunts for whores and thieves; balk a projection of either timber or land, here used for illicit liaisons.

19 Aretine's filth Pietro Aretino, an Italian writer of popular and obscene verse.

Of some Cynedian, or of Tacedore,
Of Ruscus' nasty loathsome brothel rime,
That stinks like Ajax[1] froth, or muck-pit slime.
The news he tells you is of some new flesh,
Lately broke up, span new,[2] hot piping fresh;
The courtesy he shows you, is some morn
To give you Venus[3] fore her smock be on.
His eyes, his tongue, his soul, his all is lust,
Which vengeance and confusion follow must.
Out on this salt humour, letchers' dropsy;
Fie, it doth soil my chaster poesy.
Oh spruce! How now, Piso, Aurelius ape,[4]
What strange disguise, what new deformed shape
Doth hold thy thoughts in contemplation?
Faith, say, what fashion art thou thinking on?
A stitch'd taffata cloak, a pair of slops[5]
Of Spanish leather? Oh who heard his chops
E're chew of ought, but of some strange disguise,
This fashion-monger, each morn fore he rise
Contemplates suit shapes, & once from out his bed,
He hath them straight full lively portrayed.
And then he chukes,[6] and is as proud of this,
As Taphus when he got his neighbour's bliss.
All fashions since the first year of this queen,
May in his study fairly drawn be seen,
And all that shall be to his day of doom,
You may peruse within that little room.
For not a fashion once dare show his face,
But from neat Piso first must take his grace.
The long fool's coat, the huge slop, the lugg'd[7] boot
From mimic Piso, all do claim their root.
Oh that the boundless power of the soul
Should be coop'd up in fashioning some roule![8]
But ô, Suffenus (that doth hug, embrace
His proper self, admires his own sweet face,
Praiseth his own fair limbs' proportion,
Kisseth his shade, recounteth all alone
His own good parts), who envies him? not I,
For well he may, without all rivalry.
Fie, whither's fled my spright's alacrity?
How dull I vent this humorous[9] poesy.
In faith I am sad, I am possessed with ruth,
To see the vainness of fair Albion's[10] youth;
To see their richest time even wholly spent
In that which is but gentry's ornament,
Which being meanly[11] done, becomes them well,
But when with dear time's loss they do excel,
How ill they do things well. To dance and sing,
To vault, to fence, and fairly trot a ring
With good grace, meanly done. Oh what repute
They do beget, but being absolute,
It argues too much time, too much regard
Employ'd in that which might be better spared,
Than substance should be lost. If one should sue
For Lesbia's[12] love, having two days to woo
And not one more, and should employ those twain
The favour of her waiting-wench to gain,
Were he not mad? Your apprehension,
Your wits are quick in application.

Gallants,
Me thinks your souls should grudge, and inly scorn
To be made slave to humours that are born
In slime of filthy sensuality.
That part not subject to mortality
(Boundless discursive apprehension
Giving it wings to act his function)[13]

[1] Ajax a pun on "jakes" (toilet).
[2] span new brand new.
[3] Venus the goddess of love and seduction; here, it is the name of a prostitute.
[4] Aurelius ape someone who "apes" the fashions of other countries. Aurelius may refer to Marcus Aurelius, a Roman emperor.
[5] pair of slops baggy breeches.
[6] chukes chuckles or alternatively chokes (which would follow the earlier reference to chewing chops).
[7] lugg'd A lug is a flap of material, so a "lugged boot" refers to fashionable high boots with large cuffs.
[8] roule This could refer to "roll" as in a roll of cloth, or "role" as in a persona.
[9] humorous i.e., about humours, or in a certain humour.
[10] Albion England.
[11] meanly i.e., in the mean, moderately.
[12] Lesbia The island of Lesbos was home to the poet Sappho, some of whose poetry celebrated love between women.
[13] The soul is both the spirit "not subject to mortality" and the rational being or "discursive apprehension" working together.

Methinks should murmur, when you stop his course
And soil his beauties in some beastly source
Of brutish pleasures. But it is so poor,
So weak, so hunger bitten, evermore
Kept from his food, meager for want of meat,
Scorn'd and rejected, thrust from out his seat,
Upbray'd[1] by capon's grease, consumed quite
By eating stews,[2] that waste the better spright.
Snib'd[3] by his baser parts, that now poor soul
(Thus peasanted to each lewd thought's control),
Hath lost all heart, bearing all injuries,
The utmost spite, and rank'st indignities
With forced willingness. Taking great joy
If you will deign his faculties employ
But in the mean'st ingenious quality.
(How proud he'll be of any dignity?)
Put it to music, dancing, fencing school,
Lord how I laugh to hear the pretty fool,
How it will prate, his tongue shall never lie,
But still discourse of his spruce quality;
Egging his master to proceed from this,
And get the substance of celestial bliss.
His lord straight calls his parliament of sense,
But still the sensual have preeminence.
The poor soul's better part so feeble is,
So cold and dead is his Synderisis,[4]
That shadows by odd chance sometimes are got,
But oh the substance is respected not.
Here ends my rage, though angry brow was bent
Yet I have sung in sporting merriment.[5]

Finis.

To Him that Hath Perused Me.

Gentle, or ungentle hand that holdest me, let not thine eye be cast upon privateness, for I protest I glance not on it. If thou hast perused me, what lesser favour canst thou grant than not to abuse me with unjust application? Yet I fear me, I shall be much, much, injured by two sorts of readers: the one being ignorant, not knowing the nature of a satire (which is under feigned private names, to note general vices), will needs wrest each feigned name to a private unfeigned person. The other too subtle, bearing a private malice to some greater personage than he dare in his own person seem to malign, will strive by a forced application of my general reproofs to broach his private hatred, than the which I know not a greater injury can be offered to a satirist. I durst presume, knew they how guiltless and how free I were from prying into privateness, they would blush to think, how much they wrong themselves in seeking to injure me. Let this protestation satisfy our curious searchers. So may I obtain my best hopes, as I am free from endeavouring to blast any private man's good name. If any one (forced with his own guilt) will turn it home and say 'Tis I, I cannot hinder him. Neither do I injure him. For other faults of poesy, I crave no pardon, in that I scorn all penance the bitterest censurer can impose upon me. Thus (wishing each man to leave enquiring who I am, and learn to know himself), I take a solemn congee[6] of this fusty world.

—Theriomastix[7]

—1599

[1] Upbray'd reproached.

[2] stews refers to "brothels," as well as "food."

[3] Snib'd The noun "snib" means a petty thief and the verb "snib" means reprimand; both ideas could be alluded to here.

[4] Synderisis "remorse" or "the prick of conscience." The italics could represent the voice of conscience.

[5] Despite Marston's claim to a "sporting merriment" (see l.6 also), this satire is very coloured by a sense of "rage."

[6] congee farewell.

[7] Theriomastix "scourge of beasts."

Christopher Marlowe
1564-1593

Born to a shoemaker and his wife in Canterbury in February 1564, Christopher Marlowe earned a scholarship to attend the university of Cambridge and received his BA in 1584. He spent the next three years studying theology for his MA, but may also have been in the service of Queen Elizabeth's Privy Council as a secret agent in Rheims, home of a Jesuit seminary, perhaps helping in the 1586 discovery of the Babington plot against the Queen (which led to the execution of Mary Stuart, queen of Scots). In 1587, he travelled to London, and spent the next six years making a name for himself as a poet and playwright, frequently finding himself in trouble with the law. In 1589, he was sent to Newgate prison for his part in a homicide, but was released after two weeks, and in the spring of 1593 he was charged with heresy and blasphemy—an accusation which still influences scholarship on Marlowe. In May of 1593, the poet was involved in an argument over a "reckoning" or payment of a bill, and after stabbing one of the company, Marlowe was fatally injured by a dagger wound just above the right eye. Some moralists were quick to claim his death as punishment for atheism, but Marlowe was honoured by many fellow poets, and his plays—which include Tamburlaine the Great I and II (c. 1587-88), The Jew of Malta (c. 1589), Edward II (c. 1592-93), and Dr. Faustus (c. 1589/93)—remained popular after his death. Marlowe also translated Ovid's Amores, the influence of which can be seen in Hero and Leander. This poem, published in 1598, is a playful, comic rendition of part of a classical poem on the same subject by Musaeus, a Greek poet of the fourth or fifth century CE. Although the publisher believed the poem unfinished, and ended the work with Desunt nonnulla, or "Some things are missing," Marlowe's version is complete in itself, ending with a comic climax. George Chapman provided another "ending" to the poem, and the two sections were published together later in 1598.

EDITION: Hero and Leander. London: Printed by Adam Islip, for Edward Blunt, 1598. STC 17413. Lines 775-84 reordered as per Tucker Brooke, ed., Works (1910).

Hero and Leander

On Hellespont,[1] guilty of true love's blood,
In view and opposite, two cities stood,
Seaborders, disjoined by Neptune's[2] might:
The one Abydos, the other Sestos hight.[3]
At Sestos, Hero dwelt, Hero the fair,
Whom young Apollo[4] courted for her hair,
And offered as a dower[5] his burning throne,
Where she should sit for men to gaze upon.
The outside of her garments were of lawn,[6]
The lining, purple silk, with gilt stars drawn,
Her wide sleeves green, and bordered with a grove,
Where Venus in her naked glory strove
To please the careless and disdainful eyes
Of proud Adonis that before her lies.[7]
Her kirtle[8] blue, whereon was many a stain,
Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain.
Upon her head she wore a myrtle[9] wreath,
From whence her veil reached to the ground beneath.
Her veil was artificial flowers and leaves,
Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives.

[1] Hellespont the ancient name for the strait of the Dardanelles.
[2] Seaborders lands bordering on the sea; Neptune the Roman sea god.
[3] Abydos ... Sestos Greek colonies founded in the early seventh century; hight called.
[4] Apollo the god of light and youth, often associated with the sun, and the patron of music and poetry.
[5] dower dowry; given by a bride to her husband or husband to his bride's relatives: here, a gift.
[6] lawn fine linen.
[7] Where Venus ... before her lies Venus, the Roman goddess of love, fell in love with the beautiful, young Adonis, who refused her. See Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis for one version of the story (pp. 1059-79).
[8] kirtle skirt or petticoat.
[9] myrtle Held sacred to Venus, myrtle was used as an emblem of love.

Many would praise the sweet smell as she passed,
When t'was the odour which her breath forth cast,
And there for honey, bees have sought in vain,
And beat from thence, have lighted there again.
About her neck hung chains of pebble stone,
Which, lightened by her neck, like diamonds shone.
She wore no gloves, for neither sun nor wind
Would burn or parch her hands, but to her mind,[1]
Or warm or[2] cool them, for they took delight
To play upon those hands, they were so white.
Buskins[3] of shells all silvered, used she,
And branched[4] with blushing coral to the knee,
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold.
Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
Which as she went would chirrup through the bills.[5]
Some say for her the fairest Cupid[6] pined,
And looking in her face, was stricken blind.
But this is true, so like was one the other,
As he imagined Hero was his mother,
And oftentimes into her bosom flew,
About her naked neck his bare arms threw,
And laid his childish head upon her breast,
And with still panting rocked, there took his rest.
So lovely fair was Hero, Venus' nun,
As nature wept, thinking she was undone,
Because she took more from her than she left,
And of such wondrous beauty her bereft.
Therefore in sign her treasure suffered wrack,
Since Hero's time, hath half the world been black.[7]

Amorous Leander, beautiful and young
(Whose tragedy divine Musaeus[8] sung),
Dwelt at Abydos; since him dwelt there none
For whom succeeding times make greater moan.
His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
Had they been cut and unto Colchis borne,
Would have allured the vent'rous youth of Greece,
To hazard more than for the Golden Fleece.[9]
Fair Cynthia[10] wished his arms might be her sphere,
Grief makes her pale, because she moves not there.
His body was as straight as Circe's wand;[11]
Jove[12] might have sipped out nectar from his hand.
Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
So was his neck in touching, and surpassed
The white of Pelops' shoulder;[13] I could tell ye
How smooth his breast was, and how white his belly,
And whose immortal fingers did imprint
That heavenly path with many a curious dint
That runs along his back, but my rude pen
Can hardly blazon[14] forth the loves of men,
Much less of powerful gods. Let it suffice,
That my slack[15] muse sings of Leander's eyes,
Those orient[16] cheeks and lips, exceeding his
That leapt into the water for a kiss
Of his own shadow, and despising many,

---

1 but to her mind but mind or attend to her.

2 Or ... or either ... or.

3 Buskins Boots reaching to the calf or knee.

4 branched adorned.

5 Mechanical birds sit on Hero's boots, and "chirrup" as the water moves through them when Hero walks.

6 Cupid the boy-god of love, son of Venus.

7 The pronouns and possessives become ambiguous here. Nature weeps because Hero took more from nature than she left; therefore, to show that nature's treasure suffers injury, the world is left in darkness half the time.

8 Musaeus a Greek poet of the fourth or fifth century CE who wrote a poem on Hero and Leander which survives. Nothing is known about the poet.

9 the vent'rous youth of Greece ... Golden Fleece Jason and the Argonauts sailed to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece, a symbol of power.

10 Cynthia goddess of the moon, associated with chastity.

11 Circe's wand In the Odyssey, Circe uses her wand to turn Odysseus' companions into swine.

12 Jove Jupiter, the highest deity of the ancient Romans.

13 Pelops' shoulder When Tantalus killed his son Pelops and served his flesh to the gods at a banquet, Pelops' mother inadvertently ate some of his shoulder; when Pelops was brought back to life, this shoulder was replaced with ivory.

14 blazon to proclaim; to list the attributes or virtues.

15 slack slow or weak.

16 orient lustrous, radiant.

Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.[1]
Had wild Hippolytus[2] Leander seen,
Enamoured of his beauty had he been;
His presence made the rudest peasant melt,
That in the vast uplandish[3] country dwelt;
The barbarous Thracian soldier, moved with nought,
Was moved with him, and for his favour sought.
Some swore he was a maid in man's attire,
For in his looks were all that men desire,
A pleasant, smiling cheek, a speaking eye,
A brow for love to banquet royally,
And such as knew he was a man would say,
"Leander, thou art made for amorous play;
Why art thou not in love, and loved of all?
Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall."[4]
The men of wealthy Sestos, every year
(For his sake whom their goddess[5] held so dear, Rose-cheeked Adonis) kept a solemn feast.
Thither resorted many a wandering guest
To meet their loves; such as had none at all,
Came lovers home from this great festival.
For every street like to a firmament[6]
Glistered with breathing stars, who, where they went,
Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed
As if another Phaeton had got
The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.[7]
But far above the loveliest, Hero shined,
And stole away th'enchanted gazer's mind,
For like sea-nymphs'[8] inveigling harmony,
So was her beauty to the standers-by.
Nor that night-wandering pale and watery star[9]
(When yawning dragons draw her thirling[10] car
From Latmos'[11] mount up to the gloomy sky,
Where crowned with blazing light and majesty,
She proudly sits) more over-rules the flood,
Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
Even as, when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,
Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,[12]
Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain,
From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,
So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
And all that viewed her were enamoured on her.
And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
Their fellows being slain or put to flight,
Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dead strooken,[13]
So at her presence all surprised and tooken[14]
Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
He whom she favours lives, the other dies.
There might you see one sigh, another rage,
And some (their violent passions to assuage)
Compile sharp satires, but alas too late,
For faithful love will never turn to hate.
And many, seeing great princes were denied,
Pined as they went, and thinking on her, died.
On this feast day, O cursed day and hour,
Went Hero thorough[15] Sestos, from her tower
To Venus' temple, where unhappily,
As after chanced, they did each other spy.
So fair a church as this had Venus none:

---

1 his / That leapt … love of any Narcissus fell into the water attempting to kiss his own reflection.

2 Hippolytus a man devoted to chastity and the chase, and a worshipper of Artemis, the goddess of wildlife and a virgin huntress.

3 uplandish rustic, uncultivated.

4 thrall slave or captive.

5 their goddess Venus.

6 firmament the sky or heavens.

7 Phaeton … chariot The son of Helios or the sun, Phaeton attempted to drive his father's sun chariot, but was unequal to guiding the horses. To save the earth from being burnt up, Zeus hurled a thunderbolt at Phaeton, who fell into the river Eriadnus.

8 sea-nymphs Nymphs are a class of semi-divine beings, imagined as beautiful maidens inhabiting the sea, the hills, the woods, etc. Here the nymphs appear to be aligned with mermaids or sirens, whose song could draw men to destruction.

9 night-wandering pale and watery star The moon, or Cynthia, is pale because she is reflected light, and watery because she controls the tides.

10 thirling whirling, flying.

11 Latmos Cynthia's seat.

12 Ixion's shaggy-footed race Ixion's sons were Centaurs, shaped with the upper half of a man's body attached to the body of a horse.

13 strooken struck.

14 tooken taken.

15 thorough through.

The walls were of discoloured jasper stone,[1]
Wherein was Proteus[2] carved, and o'erhead,
A lively vine of green sea agate spread,
Where by one hand light-headed Bacchus[3] hung,
And with the other, wine from grapes out-wrung.
Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
The town of Sestos called it Venus' glass.
There might you see the gods in sundry shapes
Committing heady riots, incest, rapes.
For know that underneath this radiant flower
Was Danae's statue in a brazen tower;[4]
Jove, slyly stealing from his sister's bed,
To dally with Idalian Ganymed;[5]
And for his love Europa,[6] bellowing loud,
And tumbling with the rainbow in a cloud;
Blood-quaffing Mars, heaving the iron net
Which limping Vulcan and his Cyclops set;[7]
Love kindling fire to burn such towns as Troy;[8]
Sylvanus[9] weeping for the lovely boy
That now is turned into a cypress tree,
Under whose shade the wood gods love to be.
And in the midst a silver altar stood,
There Hero, sacrificing turtles' blood,[10]

Veiled to the ground, veiling her eyelids close,
And modestly they opened as she rose;
Thence flew Love's arrow with the golden head,
And thus Leander was enamoured.
Stone still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
Till with the fire that from his count'nance blazed,
Relenting Hero's gentle heart was stroock,
Such force and virtue hath an amorous look.
It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is overruled by fate.
When two are stripped long ere the course begin,
We wish that one should lose, the other win.
And one especially do we affect,
Of two gold ingots[11] like in each respect.
The reason no man knows; let it suffice,
What we behold is censured by our eyes.
Where both deliberate, the love is slight;
Who ever loved that loved not at first sight?
He kneeled, but unto her devoutly prayed.
Chaste Hero to herself thus softly said,
"Were I the saint he worships, I would hear him,"
And as she spoke those words, came somewhat near him.
He started up, she blushed as one ashamed,
Wherewith Leander much more was inflamed.
He touched her hand; in touching it she trembled;
Love deeply grounded hardly[12] is dissembled.
These lovers parled[13] by the touch of hands;
True love is mute, and oft amazed stands.
Thus while dumb signs their yielding hearts entangled,
The air with sparks of living fire was spangled,
And Night, deep-drenched in misty Acheron,[14]
Heaved up her head, and half the world upon
Breathed darkness forth (dark night is Cupid's day),
And now begins Leander to display
Love's holy fire with words, with sighs and tears,
Which like sweet music entered Hero's ears,

[1] jasper stone a green coloured stone.

[2] Proteus an ancient god of the sea who had knowledge of all things and could assume different shapes in order to avoid answering questions.

[3] Bacchus Roman god of wine.

[4] Danae's statue in a brazen tower Fearing a prophecy which stated he would be killed by his daughter's son, Acrisius confined Danae in a brazen tower so that no suitors could approach her. Zeus fell in love with her and visited her in a shower of gold.

[5] Jove … Idalian Ganymed Ganymede, a young, beautiful Trojan prince, was Jove's cup bearer. The homoeroticism of the episode fits well with Marlowe's poem; Idalian Jove kidnapped Ganymede from Mount Ida.

[6] Europa Zeus took the form of a bull to woo Europa.

[7] Blood-quaffing Mars … Cyclops set Mars is primarily associated with war, but was also Venus's lover. Vulcan, Venus's husband and a fire god and god of smiths, captured Mars in an iron net. Vulcan was born lame. Cyclops were one-eyed giants and helpers of Vulcan.

[8] Love … Troy The Trojan war began as a fight over a woman, Helen.

[9] Sylvanus Sylvanus was a wood god whose lover, Cyparissus, was turned into a tree. The Cyprus (cypress) tree is known as a "mournful" tree.

[10] turtles' blood The turtle dove was noted for its affection for its mate.

[11] gold ingots gold pieces.

[12] hardly with difficulty.

[13] parled talked.

[14] Acheron river of the lower world; more generally, the infernal regions.

And yet at every word she turned aside,
And always cut him off as he replied.
At last, like to a bold, sharp sophister,[1]
With cheerful hope thus he accosted her.
"Fair creature, let me speak without offence;
I would my rude words had the influence
To lead thy thoughts, as thy fair looks do mine;
Then shouldst thou be his prisoner who is thine.
Be not unkind and fair; misshapen stuff
Are of behaviour boisterous and rough.
Oh shun me not, but hear me ere you go,
God knows I cannot force love, as you do.
My words shall be as spotless as my youth,
Full of simplicity and naked truth.
This sacrifice (whose sweet perfume descending
From Venus' altar to your footsteps bending)
Doth testify that you exceed her far,
To whom you offer, and whose nun you are.
Why should you worship her, her you surpass,
As much as sparkling diamonds flaring[2] glass.
A diamond set in lead his[3] worth retains;
A heavenly nymph, beloved of human swains,[4]
Receives no blemish, but oft times more grace,
Which makes me hope, although I am but base,
Base in respect of thee, divine and pure,
Dutiful service may thy love procure,
And I in duty will excel all other,
As thou in beauty dost exceed Love's mother.
Nor heaven, nor thou, were made to gaze upon,
As heaven preserves all things, so save thou one.[5]
A stately builded ship, well-rigged and tall,
The ocean maketh more majestical.
Why vowest thou then to live in Sestos here,
Who on Love's seas more glorious wouldst appear?
Like untuned golden strings all women are,
Which, long time lie untouched, will harshly jar.[6]
Vessels of brass oft handled brightly shine;
What difference betwixt the richest mine
And basest mould, but use? For both not used
Are of like worth. Then treasure is abused
When misers keep it; being put to loan,
In time it will return us two for one.
Rich robes themselves and others do adorn,
Neither themselves nor others, if not worn.
Who builds a palace and rams up the gate,
Shall see it ruinous and desolate.
Ah, simple Hero, learn thyself to cherish;
Lone women, like to empty houses, perish.
Less sins the poor rich man that starves himself,
In heaping up a mass of drossy pelf,[7]
Than such as you; his golden earth remains,
Which, after his decease, some other gains.
But this fair gem, sweet in the loss alone,
When you fleet hence, can be bequeathed to none.
Or if it could, down from th'enameled sky,
All heaven would come to claim this legacy,
And with intestine broils[8] the world destroy,
And quite confound nature's sweet harmony.
Well therefore by the gods decreed it is,
We human creatures should enjoy that bliss.
One is no number, maids are nothing then,
Without the sweet society of men.
Wilt thou live single still? One shalt thou be,
Though never-singling Hymen[9] couple thee.
Wild savages, that drink of running springs,
Think water far excels all earthly things,
But they that daily taste neat[10] wine, despise it.
Virginity, albeit some highly prize it,
Compared with marriage, had you tried them both,
Differs as much as wine and water doth.
Base bullion for the stamp's sake we allow,[11]
Even so for men's impression do we you,

[1] sophister originally a wise or learned man, though later used disparagingly to indicate a specious reasoner or one who prefers rhetoric to the substance of knowledge.
[2] flaring gaudy.
[3] his its.
[4] swains men, lovers.
[5] one i.e., Leander.
[6] jar make a harsh, grating sound; discord.
[7] drossy pelf impure or worthless riches.
[8] intestine broils internal or civil wars.
[9] Hymen Greek god of marriage.
[10] neat pure, undiluted.
[11] Base bullion … allow i.e., we value base metals because they are stamped with the monarch's head or an indication of monetary worth.

By which alone, our reverend fathers say,
Women receive perfection every way.
This idol which you term virginity
Is neither essence subject to the eye,
No, nor to any one exterior sense,
Nor hath it any place of residence,
Nor is't of earth or mould celestial,
Or capable of any form at all.
Of that which hath no being do not boast;
Things that are not at all are never lost.
Men foolishly do call it virtuous;
What virtue is it, that is born with us?
Much less can honour be ascribed thereto;
Honour is purchased by the deeds we do.
Believe me, Hero, honour is not won,
Until some honourable deed be done.
Seek you for chastity, immortal fame,
And know that some have wronged Diana's[1] name?
Whose name is it, if she be false or not,
So she be fair, but some vile tongues will blot?
But you are fair (aye me), so wondrous fair,
So young, so gentle, and so debonair,
As Greece will think if thus you live alone,
Some one or other keeps you as his own.
Then, Hero, hate me not, nor from me fly,
To follow swiftly blasting infamy.
Perhaps thy sacred priesthood makes thee loath;
Tell me, to whom mad'st thou that heedless oath?"
"To Venus," answered she, and as she spake,
Forth from those two translucent cisterns[2] brake
A stream of liquid pearl, which down her face
Made milk-white paths, whereon the gods might trace
To Jove's high court. He thus replied: "The rites
In which love's beauteous empress most delights
Are banquets, Doric music,[3] midnight revel,
Plays, masques, and all that stern age counteth evil.
Thee as a holy idiot[4] doth she scorn,
For thou, in vowing chastity, hast sworn
To rob her name and honour, and thereby
Commit'st a sin far worse than perjury,
Even sacrilege against her deity,
Through regular and formal purity.
To expiate which sin, kiss and shake hands,
Such sacrifice as this Venus demands."
Thereat she smiled, and did deny him so,
As put thereby, yet might he hope for mo.[5]
Which makes him quickly re-enforce his speech,
And her in humble manner thus beseech.
"Though neither gods nor men may thee deserve,
Yet for her sake whom you have vowed to serve,
Abandon fruitless, cold virginity,
The gentle Queen of Love's sole enemy.
Then shall you most resemble Venus' nun,
When Venus' sweet rites are performed and done.
Flint-breasted Pallas[6] joys in single life,
But Pallas and your mistress are at strife.
Love, Hero, then, and be not tyrannous,
But heal the heart that thou hast wounded thus,
Nor stain thy youthful years with avarice;
Fair fools delight to be accounted nice.[7]
The richest corn[8] dies if it be not reaped;
Beauty alone is lost, too warily kept."
These arguments he used, and many more,
Wherewith she yielded, that was won before;
Hero's looks yielded, but her words made war;
Women are won when they begin to jar.
Thus having swallowed Cupid's golden hook,
The more she strived, the deeper was she stroock.
Yet evilly feigning anger, strove she still,
And would be thought to grant against her will.
So having paused a while, at last she said:
"Who taught thee rhetoric to deceive a maid?
Aye me, such words as these should I abhor,
And yet I like them for the orator."

[1] Diana another name for Cynthia, the goddess of the moon, associated with chastity.
[2] cisterns vessels; here, her eyes.
[3] Doric music a stately, solemn mode—an odd choice for this list.
[4] idiot an unskilled, uneducated person; a layman.
[5] mo more.
[6] Flint-breasted Pallas Pallas Athene or Minerva, goddess of war, often represented in armour.
[7] nice reluctant, reserved.
[8] corn grain.

With that Leander stooped, to have embraced her,
But from his spreading arms away she cast her,
And thus bespake him: "Gentle youth, forbear
To touch the sacred garments which I wear.
Upon a rock, and underneath a hill,
Far from the town (where all is whist[1] and still,
Save that the sea playing on yellow sand
Sends forth a rattling murmur to the land,
Whose sound allures the golden Morpheus,[2]
In silence of the night to visit us)
My turret stands, and there God knows I play
With Venus' swans and sparrows all the day;
A dwarfish beldame[3] bears me company,
That hops about the chamber where I lie,
And spends the night (that might be better spent)
In vain discourse and apish merriment.
Come thither." As she spake this, her tongue tripped,
For unawares "Come thither" from her slipped,
And suddenly her former colour changed,
And here and there her eyes through anger ranged,
And like a planet, moving several ways,
At one self instant, she, poor soul, assays,[4]
Loving, not to love at all, and every part
Strove to resist the motions of her heart.
And hands so pure, so innocent, nay such
As might have made heaven stoop to have a touch,
Did she uphold to Venus, and again
Vowed spotless chastity, but all in vain.
Cupid beats down her prayers with his wings,
Her vows above the empty air he flings.
All deep enraged, his sinewy bow he bent,
And shot a shaft that burning from him went,
Wherewith she stroocken, looked so dolefully,
As made Love sigh to see his tyranny.
And as she wept, her tears to pearl he turned,
And wound them on his arm, and for her mourned.

Then towards the palace of the Destinies,[5]
Laden with languishment and grief, he flies,
And to those stern nymphs humbly made request,
Both might enjoy each other, and be blessed.
But with a ghastly dreadful countenance,
Threatening a thousand deaths at every glance,
They answered Love, nor would vouchsafe so much
As one poor word, their hate to him was such.
Harken a while, and I will tell you why:
Heaven's winged herald, Jove-born Mercury,[6]
The selfsame day that he asleep had laid
Enchanted Argus, spied a country maid,
Whose careless hair, instead of pearl t'adorn it,
Glistered with dew, as one that seemed to scorn it;
Her breath as fragrant as the morning rose,
Her mind pure and her tongue untaught to gloze.[7]
Yet proud she was (for lofty pride that dwells
In towered courts is oft in shepherd's cells),[8]
And too too well the fair vermillion knew
And silver tincture of her cheeks that drew
The love of every swain. On her, this god
Enamoured was, and with his snaky rod[9]
Did charm her nimble feet, and made her stay;
The while upon a hillock down he lay,
And sweetly on his pipe began to play,
And with smooth speech, her fancy to assay,
Till in his twining arms he locked her fast,
And then he wooed with kisses, and at last,
As shepherds do, her on the ground he laid,

---

1 whist hushed, quiet.

2 Morpheus the Greek god of sleep or dreams.

3 beldame old woman.

4 assays tries, attempts.

5 Destinies the Fates. The three daughters of Night control fate, which is symbolically represented by Clotho holding the distaff, Lachesis drawing off the thread, and Atropos cutting it short.

6 Mercury messenger to the gods and known for his eloquence. Mercury enchanted Argus, the many-eyed herdsman whom Juno had ordered to guard Io from the advances of Jupiter. Io was a woman Jupiter had fallen in love with; he turned her into a cow to keep Juno from harming her.

7 gloze flatter.

8 cells small dwellings.

9 snaky rod Mercury is represented holding a staff on which serpents are twined.

And tumbling in the grass, he often strayed
Beyond the bounds of shame, in being bold
To eye those parts, which no eye should behold,
And like an insolent commanding lover,
Boasting his parentage, would needs discover
The way to new Elysium;[1] but she,
Whose only dower was her chastity,
Having striven in vain, was now about to cry,
And crave the help of shepherds that were nigh;
Herewith he stayed his fury, and began
To give her leave to rise; away she ran,
After went Mercury, who used such cunning,
As she to hear his tale, left off her running.
Maids are not won by brutish force and might,
But speeches full of pleasure and delight.
And knowing Hermes[2] courted her, was glad
That she such loveliness and beauty had
As could provoke his liking, yet was mute,
And neither would deny, nor grant his suit.
Still vowed he love, she wanting no excuse
To feed him with delays, as women use,
Or thirsting after immortality—
All women are ambitious naturally—
Imposed upon her lover such a task,
As he ought not perform, nor yet she ask.
A draught of flowing nectar, she requested,
Wherewith the king of gods and men is feasted.
He, ready to accomplish what she willed,
Stole some from Hebe[3] (Hebe, Jove's cup filled)
And gave it to his simple rustic love,
Which being known (as what is hid from Jove?)
He[4] inly stormed, and waxed more furious
Than for the fire filched by Prometheus,[5]
And thrusts him down from heaven; he wandering here,
In mournful terms, with sad and heavy cheer
Complained to Cupid. Cupid, for his sake,
To be revenged on Jove did undertake,
And those on whom heaven, earth, and hell relies,
I mean the adamantine[6] Destinies,
He wounds with love, and forced them equally,
To dote upon deceitful Mercury.
They offered him the deadly, fatal knife,
That shears the slender threads of human life;
At his fair feathered feet,[7] the engines laid,
Which th'earth from ugly Chaos'[8] den up-weighed:
These he regarded not, but did entreat
That Jove, usurper of his father's seat,
Might presently be banished into hell,
And aged Saturn in Olympus dwell.[9]
They granted what he craved, and once again,
Saturn and Ops[10] began their golden reign.
Murder, rape, war, lust, and treachery
Were, with Jove, closed in Stygian Empery.[11]
But long this blessed time continued not;
As soon as he his wished purpose got,
He, reckless of his promise, did despise
The love of th'everlasting Destinies.
They seeing it, both Love and him abhorred,
And Jupiter unto his place restored.
And but that Learning, in despite of Fate,
Will mount aloft and enter heaven's gate,
And to the seat of Jove itself advance,
Hermes[12] had slept in hell with ignorance.
Yet as a punishment they added this,
That he and Poverty should always kiss.
And to this day is every scholar poor;
Gross gold from them runs headlong to the boor.[13]

---

1 Elysium abode or state of the blessed after death.

2 Hermes another name for Mercury.

3 Hebe the handmaiden of the gods, associated with perpetual youth.

4 He Jove.

5 filched stolen; Prometheus He made humankind out of clay, and when Zeus deprived them of fire, he stole it from Heaven.

6 adamantine unyielding, invulnerable.

7 feathered feet Mercury is depicted with wings on his sandals.

8 Chaos the gaping or formless void, out of which the cosmos was evolved.

9 Jove, usurper … Olympus dwell Jove is Saturn's son; Saturn is an Italian god of agriculture (later identified with the Greek Cronus); in Greek mythology Olympus is a mountain whose summit is regarded as the residence of the gods.

10 Ops Saturn's wife, the goddess of the wealth of the harvest.

11 Stygian Empery the empire of hell; the Styx was the principal river in the underworld.

12 Hermes Hermes or Mercury is here represented as Learning.

13 boor peasant.

Likewise the angry sisters[1] thus deluded,
To venge themselves on Hermes have concluded
That Midas' brood[2] shall sit in Honour's chair,
To which the Muses' sons are only heir.
And fruitful wits that in aspiring are,
Shall, discontent, run into regions far,
And few great lords in virtuous deeds shall joy,
But be surprised with every garish toy,
And still enrich the lofty[3] servile clown,
Who with encroaching guile keeps learning down.
Then muse not Cupid's suit no better sped,[4]
Seeing in their loves the Fates were injured.
By this, sad Hero, with love unacquainted
Viewing Leander's face, fell down and fainted.
He kissed her and breathed life into her lips,
Wherewith as one displeased, away she trips.
Yet as she went full often looked behind,
And many poor excuses did she find
To linger by the way, and once she stayed,
And would have turned again, but was afraid
In offering parley,[5] to be counted light.
So on she goes, and in her idle flight,
Her painted fan of curled plumes let fall,
Thinking to train[6] Leander therewithal.
He, being a novice, knew not what she meant,
But stayed, and after her a letter sent,
Which joyful Hero answered in such sort,
As he had hope to scale the beauteous fort
Wherein the liberal Graces locked their wealth,
And therefore to her tower he got by stealth.
Wide open stood the door, he need not climb,
And she herself before the pointed[7] time,
Had spread the board,[8] with roses strewed the room,
And oft looked out and mused he did not come.
At last he came, Oh who can tell the greeting,
These greedy lovers had at their first meeting.

He asked, she gave, and nothing was denied,
Both to each other quickly were affied.[9]
Look how their hands, so were their hearts united,
And what he did, she willingly requited.
(Sweet are the kisses, the embracements sweet,
When like desires and affections meet,
For from the earth to heaven is Cupid raised,
Where fancy is in equal balance paised.)[10]
Yet she this rashness suddenly repented,
And turned aside and to herself lamented,
As if her name and honour had been wronged,
By being possessed of him for whom she longed.
I,[11] and she wished, albeit not from her heart,
That he would leave her turret and depart.
The mirthful god of amorous pleasure smiled,
To see how he this captive nymph beguiled,
For hitherto he did but fan the fire,
And kept it down that it might mount the higher.
Now waxed she jealous, lest his love abated,
Fearing, her own thoughts made her to be hated.[12]
Therefore unto him hastily she goes,
And like light Salmacis,[13] her body throws
Upon his bosom, where with yielding eyes,
She offers up herself a sacrifice
To slake his anger, if he were displeased;
Oh what god would not therewith be appeased?
Like Aesop's cock,[14] this jewel he enjoyed,
And as a brother with his sister toyed,
Supposing nothing else was to be done,
Now he her favour and good will had won.
But know you not that creatures wanting sense[15]

---

1 angry sisters the Destinies.

2 Midas' brood Everything Midas touched became gold; apparently this was passed on to his children.

3 lofty haughty.

4 sped prospered.

5 parley conversation.

6 train to draw on, entice.

7 pointed appointed.

8 spread the board placed food on the table.

9 affied affianced.

10 paised peised or weighed.

11 I either the narrator is including himself here, or this means "aye" or yes.

12 Fearing, her ... hated Her fear makes her imagine she is hated.

13 Salmacis the nymph of the fountain in which Hermaphroditus bathed; he rejected her entreaties, but she embraced him and their bodies joined. A hermaphrodite is a person combining both sexes in one body.

14 Aesop's cock Aesop was a composer of animal fables. His cock found a jewel in the barnyard, but spurned it because it was not barleycorn.

15 wanting sense lacking the senses, or common sense, or perhaps intellect.

By nature have a mutual appetence,[1]
And wanting organs[2] to advance a step,
Moved by Love's force, unto each other lep?[3]
Much more in subjects having intellect,
Some hidden influence breeds like effect.
Albeit Leander, rude in love and raw,
Long dallying with Hero, nothing saw
That might delight him more, yet he suspected
Some amorous rites or other were neglected.
Therefore unto his body, hers he clung;
She, fearing on the rushes[4] to be flung,
Strived with redoubled strength; the more she strived,
The more a gentle pleasing heat revived,
Which taught him all that elder lovers know,
And now the same 'gan so to scorch and glow,
As in plain terms (yet cunningly), he craved it.
Love always makes those eloquent that have it.
She, with a kind of granting, put him by it,
And ever as he thought himself most nigh it,
Like to the tree of Tantalus[5] she fled,
And seeming lavish, saved her maidenhead.
Ne'er king more sought to keep his diadem[6]
Than Hero this inestimable gem.
Above our life we love a steadfast friend,
Yet when a token of great worth we send,
We often kiss it, often look thereon,
And stay the messenger that would be gone;
No marvel then, though Hero would not yield
So soon to part from that she dearly held.
Jewels being lost are found again; this, never.
'Tis lost but once, and once lost, lost forever.
Now had the morn espied her lover's steeds,[7]
Whereat she starts, puts on her purple weeds,
And red for anger that he stayed so long,
All headlong throws herself the clouds among;
And now Leander, fearing to be missed,
Embraced her suddenly, took leave, and kissed,
Long was he taking leave, and loath to go,
And kissed again, as lovers use to do;
Sad Hero wrung him by the hand and wept,
Saying, "Let your vows and promises be kept."
Then standing at the door, she turned about,
As loath to see Leander going out.
And now the sun that through th'orizon[8] peeps,
As pitying these lovers, downward creeps,
So that in silence of the cloudy night,
Though it was morning, did he take his flight.
But what the secret trusty night concealed,
Leander's amorous habit soon revealed;
With Cupid's myrtle was his bonnet crowned,
About his arms the purple ribbon wound,
Wherewith she wreathed her largely spreading hair.
Nor could the youth abstain, but he must wear
The sacred ring wherewith she was endowed
When first religious chastity she vowed,
Which made his love through Sestos to be known,
And thence unto Abydos sooner blown
Than he could sail, for incorporeal Fame,[9]
Whose weight consists in nothing but her name,
Is swifter than the wind, whose tardy plumes
Are reeking[10] water and dull earthly fumes.
Home when he came, he seemed not to be there,
But like exiled air thrust from his sphere,
Set in a foreign place, and straight from thence,
Alcides-like,[11] by mighty violence,
He would have chased away the swelling main,[12]
That him from her unjustly did detain.
Like as the sun, in a diameter
Fires and enflames objects removed far,

---

1 appetence appetite, longing.
2 organs means, faculties.
3 lep leapt.
4 rushes a type of plant; green rushes were used as floor coverings.
5 tree of Tantalus For revealing the secrets of the gods (or for serving his son's flesh to the gods, or for stealing the gods' nectar),Tantalus was punished in the underworld with an extreme thirst and hunger; he was placed near a fruit tree whose branches were tossed aside by the wind every time Tantalus tried to grasp the fruit.
6 diadem crown.
7 the morn Aurora; her lover's steeds Apollo's horses drew the sun chariot across the sky.
8 th'orizon the horizon.
9 incorporeal Fame fame without substance; rumour.
10 reeking smoking or steaming.
11 Alcides-like like Hercules.
12 main an expanse of water; here the Hellespont, the body of water between Abydos and Sestos.

And heateth kindly, shining lat'rally,[1]
So beauty sweetly quickens when 'tis nigh,
But being separated and removed,
Burns where it cherished, murders where it loved.
Therefore even as an index to a book,
So to his mind was young Leander's look.[2]
Oh none but gods have power their love to hide,
Affection by the countenance is descried.
The light of hidden fire itself discovers,
And love that is concealed betrays poor lovers.
His secret flame apparently was seen,
Leander's father knew where he had been,
And for the same mildly rebuked his son,
Thinking to quench the sparkles new begun.
But love resisted once grows passionate,
And nothing more than counsel, lovers hate.
For as a hot, proud horse highly disdains
To have his head controlled, but breaks the reins,
Spits forth the ringled[3] bit and with his hooves
Checks the submissive ground, so he that loves,
The more he is restrained, the worse he fares;
What is it now but mad Leander dares?
"O Hero, Hero," thus he cried full oft,
And then he got him to a rock aloft,
Where having spied her tower, long stared he on't,
And prayed the narrow toiling Hellespont
To part in twain, that he might come and go,
But still the rising billows answered no.
With that he stripped him to the ivory skin,
And crying, "Love I come!" leapt lively in.
Whereat the sapphire-visaged god[4] grew proud,
And made his cap'ring triton[5] sound aloud,
Imagining that Ganymede, displeased,
Had left the heavens; therefore on him he seized.
Leander strived, the waves about him wound,
And pulled him to the bottom, where the ground
Was strewed with pearl, and in low coral groves
Sweet singing mermaids sported with their loves
On heaps of heavy gold, and took great pleasure
To spurn, in careless sort, the shipwrack treasure.
For here the stately azure palace stood,
Where kingly Neptune and his train abode;
The lusty god embraced him, called him love,
And swore he never should return to Jove.
But when he knew it was not Ganymed,
For underwater he was almost dead,
He heaved him up, and looking on his face,
Beat down the bold waves with his triple mace,
Which mounted up, intending to have kissed him,
And fell in drops like tears because they missed him.
Leander, being up, began to swim,
And looking back, saw Neptune follow him.
Whereat aghast, the poor soul 'gan to cry,
"Oh let me visit Hero ere I die!"
The god put Helle's bracelet[6] on his arm,
And swore the sea should never do him harm.
He clapped his plump cheeks, with his tresses played,
And smiling wantonly, his love bewrayed.[7]
He watched his arms, and as they opened wide,
At every stroke, betwixt them would he slide,
And steal a kiss, and then run out and dance,
And as he turned, cast many a lustful glance,
And threw him gaudy toys to please his eye,
And dive into the water, and there pry
Upon his breast, his thighs, and every limb,
And up again, and close beside him swim
And talk of love. Leander made reply,
"You are deceived, I am no woman I."
Thereat smiled Neptune, and then told a tale,
How that a shepherd sitting in a vale,
Played with a boy so fair and kind,
As for his love both earth and heaven pined,
That of the cooling river durst not drink,
Lest water nymphs should pull him from the brink.

[1] a diameter … shining lat'rally The sun shines in a diameter—directly and thus strongly—or it shines laterally—at an angle, and thus more moderately.

[2] look appearance.

[3] ringled ringed.

[4] sapphire-visaged god Neptune.

[5] cap'ring frolicsome; triton Triton is the son of Neptune, usually presented holding a trident and a shell trumpet. Here, the triton is the shell trumpet itself.

[6] Helle's bracelet Helle escaped her violent step-mother on the back of a winged and gold-fleeced ram (producer of the Golden Fleece). Helle fell off the ram's back over part of the sea called, in consequence, the Hellespont. Neptune is said to have rescued her. Helle's bracelet is meant to protect Leander, as the next line states.

[7] bewrayed revealed.

And when he sported in the fragrant lawns,
Goat-footed satyrs[1] and up-staring fawns,
Would steal him thence. Ere half this tale was done,
"Aye me," Leander cried, "th'enamoured sun,
That now should shine on Thetis'[2] glassy bower,
Descends upon my radiant Hero's tower.
Oh that these tardy arms of mine were wings,"
And as he spake, upon the waves he springs.
Neptune was angry that he gave no ear,
And in his heart, revenging malice bare.[3]
He flung at him his mace, but as it went,
He called it in, for love made him repent.
The mace, returning back, his own hand hit,
As meaning to be venged for darting it.
When this fresh-bleeding wound Leander viewed,
His colour went and came, as if he rued[4]
The grief which Neptune felt: in gentle breasts,
Relenting thoughts, remorse, and pity rests.
And who have hard hearts, and obdurate minds,
But vicious, harebrained, and illit'rate hinds?[5]
The god, seeing him with pity to be moved,
Thereon concluded that he was beloved.
(Love is too full of faith, too credulous,
With folly and false hope deluding us.)
Wherefore Leander's fancy to surprise,
To the rich ocean for gifts he flies.
'Tis wisdom to give much, a gift prevails,
When deep, persuading oratory fails.
By this, Leander, being near the land,
Cast down his weary feet and felt the sand.
Breathless albeit he were, he rested not,
Till to the solitary tower he got,
And knocked and called, at which celestial noise,
The longing heart of Hero much more joys
Than nymphs and shepherds when the timbrell[6] rings,
Or crooked dolphin when the sailor sings.[7]
She stayed not for her robes, but straight arose,
And drunk with gladness, to the door she goes,
Where seeing a naked man, she screeched for fear,
Such sights as this to tender maids are rare,
And ran into the dark herself to hide;
Rich jewels in the dark are soonest spied.
Unto her was he led, or rather drawn,
By those white limbs which sparkled through the lawn.
The nearer that he came, the more she fled,
And seeking refuge, slipped into her bed.
Whereon Leander sitting, thus began,
Though numbing cold, all feeble, faint, and wan:
"If not for love, yet love, for pity's sake,
Me in thy bed and maiden bosom take;
At least vouchsafe these arms some little room,
Who hoping to embrace thee cheerily swoom.[8]
This head was beat with many a churlish billow,
And therefore let it rest upon thy pillow."
Herewith, affrighted, Hero shrunk away,
And in her lukewarm place Leander lay,
Whose lively heat, like fire from heaven fet,[9]
Would animate gross clay, and higher set
The drooping thoughts of base declining souls
Than dreary[10] Mars, carousing nectar bowls.
His hands he cast upon her like a snare;
She, overcome with shame and sallow fear,
Like chaste Diana when Actaeon spied her,[11]
Being suddenly betrayed, dived down to hide her.
And as her silver body downward went,
With both her hands she made the bed a tent,
And in her own mind thought herself secure,
O'ercast with dim and darksome coverture.[12]
And now she lets him whisper in her ear,

---

1 satyrs woodland gods, part human, part bestial (usually either goat or horse).

2 Thetis Thetis is a sea-nymph; her "glassy bower" is therefore the sea.

3 bare bore.

4 rued lamented or pitied.

5 hinds rustics.

6 timbrell tambourine.

7 crooked … sings The sailor is Arion, a semi-mythical poet whose song charmed a dolphin, who saved Arion when the poet was thrown into the sea. Dolphins' backs are crooked or curved.

8 swoom swam.

9 fet fetched.

10 dreary bloody.

11 Like chaste Diana … spied her To punish Actaeon for spying on her when she was bathing, Diana changed him into a stag, and he was torn to pieces by his own hounds.

12 coverture cover.

Flatter, entreat, promise, protest, and swear,
Yet ever as he greedily assayed
To touch those dainties, she the Harpy[1] played,
And every limb did as a soldier stout
Defend the fort, and keep the foe-man out.
For though the rising iv'ry mount he scaled,
Which is with azure circling lines empaled,
Much like a globe (a globe may I term this,
By which love sails to regions full of bliss),
Yet there with Sisyphus[2] he toiled in vain,
Till gentle parley did the truce obtain.
Wherein Leander on her quivering breast,
Breathless spoke some things and sighed out the rest,
Which so prevailed, as he with small ado,
Enclosed her in his arms and kissed her too.
And every kiss to her was as a charm,
And to Leander as a fresh alarm,
So that the truce was broke, and she alas,
(Poor silly maiden) at his mercy was.
Love is not full of pity (as men say),
But deaf and cruel, where he means to prey,
Even as a bird, which in our hands we wring,
Forth plungeth and oft flutters with her wing.
She trembling strove; this strife of hers (like that Which made the world) another world begat,
Of unknown joy. Treason was in her thought,
And cunningly to yield herself she sought.
Seeming not won, yet won she was at length;
In such wars women use but half their strength.
Leander now like Theban Hercules,
Entered the orchard of th'esperides,[3]
Whose fruit none rightly can describe, but he
That pulls or shakes it from the golden tree.
And now she wished this night were never done,
And sighed to think upon th'approaching sun,
For much it grieved her that the bright daylight
Should know the pleasure of this blessed night.
And then like Mars and Ericine[4] displayed,
Both in each others' arms chained as they laid,
Again she knew not how to frame her look,
Or speak to him who in a moment took
That which so long, so charily[5] she kept,
And feign by stealth away she would have crept,
And to some corner secretly have gone,
Leaving Leander in the bed alone.
But as her naked feet were whipping out,
He on the sudden clinged her so about,
That mermaid-like unto the floor she slid,
And half appeared; the other half was hid.
Thus near the bed she blushing stood upright,
And from her countenance behold ye might
A kind of twilight break, which through the hair,
As from an orient cloud, glims[6] here and there.
And round about the chamber this false morn
Brought forth the day before the day was born;
So Hero's ruddy cheek, Hero betrayed,
And her all naked to his sight displayed,
Whence his admiring eyes more pleasure took
Than Dis[7] on heaps of gold fixing his look.
By this Apollo's golden harp[8] began
To sound forth music to the ocean,
Which watchful Hesperus[9] no sooner heard,
But he the day bright-bearing car[10] prepared
And ran before, as harbinger of light,
And with his flaring beams mocked ugly Night,
Till she, o'ercome with anguish, shame, and rage,
Danged[11] down to Hell her loathsome carriage.
Desunt nonnulla.[12]

—1598

---

[1] Harpy a fabulous monster having a woman's face and body and a bird's wings and claws.

[2] Sisyphus For misdeeds on earth, Sisyphus was punished in Hades by eternally rolling a large stone to the top of a hill, only to have it roll down again.

[3] like Theban … th'esperides The eleventh labour of Hercules was to steal the golden apples of the Hesperides, the three daughters of Night.

[4] Ericine Venus.

[5] charily carefully or warily.

[6] orient radiant; glims glimmers.

[7] Dis Pluto, Roman god of the underworld.

[8] Apollo's golden harp Apollo is the god of music.

[9] Hesperus Hesperus is the evening star, though the morning star is meant here.

[10] car chariot.

[11] Danged past participle of "ding": dashed or, as in later editions, hurled.

[12] Desunt nonnulla "Some things are missing."

John Stow
1524/1525-1605

From the beginning of his life as the eldest of seven children born to Elizabeth and Thomas Stow to the publication of his final work, dedicated to the Lord Mayor and citizens of London, John Stow was a quintessential Londoner, deeply invested in the history and welfare of his city. His middle-class roots also ran deep: both his father and grandfather were chandlers and he himself was a member of the guild of Merchant Taylors. As an historian, Stow had interests ranging from grand-scale national chronicles to the narrower civic focus of his most famous work, A Survey of London (1598, 1603). The 21 editions of Stow's chronicles and Survey made him a dominant voice in the latter part of the century. Unusually for historians of this period, Stow was largely self-educated, although widely read and with some command of languages other than English. While both contemporaries and later critics have commented on his lack of facility with Latin expression, the hallmarks of this "citizen historian"[1] remain his critical reading of source material and penchant for accuracy.

These characteristics gradually drew him away from the medieval chronicle tradition that informed his earlier work. Indeed, Stow's entry into historical publication came as a response to Richard Grafton's An Abridgement of the Chronicles of England (1563). Grafton's work was published ostensibly to counterbalance the highly erroneous version of Thomas Lanquet and Thomas Cooper's Epitome of Chronicles published by Thomas Marsh in 1559. However, since Grafton's history was still littered with mistakes, Marsh called on Stow to produce a corrected edition of Lanquet and Cooper. The result was A Summary of English Chronicles (1565), a volume that Grafton used without acknowledgement as the principle source for his next chronicle history, while claiming that Stow had plagiarized his Abridgement.[2] Stow retaliated with an abridgement of his own Summary that included scathing references to Grafton's work. As part of the team engaged in producing the second edition of Holinshed's Chronicles in the 1580s and author of the Chronicles of England (1580) and the Annals of England (1592), Stow continued to work at least to some extent in the medieval chronicle tradition. In his own work he retained a "civic" format (i.e., organizing information chronologically under the names of mayors and sheriffs), and included only minor narrative connections between events. However, rather than seeing in the past a repeated pattern of the turning of Fortune's wheel and a source of moral exempla for the present, Stow understood history as causal and providing an explanation for current events.[3] This interest in the relationship between past and present is perhaps one of the reasons for Stow's unusually heavy emphasis on contemporary history, with his Annals the only Tudor chronicle to include the reign of Elizabeth I from beginning to end.[4]

In his quest for accuracy, Stow was one of the first historians to make systematic use of public documents, and he travelled widely to copy manuscripts and inscriptions from monuments.[5] Fame as an inveterate collector of documents garnered Stow attention, both welcome and otherwise. On the one hand, he was invited to join the newly formed Society of Antiquaries, whose founder was the archbishop of Canterbury, Matthew Parker, and whose membership included illustrious figures like John Leland, William Lambarde, and William Camden. On the other, however, in 1568 he attracted accusations of recusancy as a result of the Roman Catholic manuscripts and documents in his possession. It appears that the report was made by Stow's brother, Thomas, probably as a salvo in a long-running fraternal feud.[6] Indeed, a search for papist books turned up, among other literature of the Counter Reformation, a copy of a manifesto circulated by the Spanish ambassador on behalf of the Duke of Alba, who led troops against Protestant rebels in the Netherlands in the 1560s. In the same year, Spain attacked English privateers in the West Indies, while four Spanish

---

1 B.L. Beer, Tudor England Observed: The World of John Stow (Phoenix Mill, 1998), p. 17.
2 W.K. Hall, "John Stow," DLB 132, pp. 282-83.
3 F.J. Levy, Tudor Historical Thought (San Marino, 1967), p. 186.
4 Beer, Tudor England Observed, p. 21.
5 Ibid., pp. 14-15.
6 P. Collinson, "John Stow and Nostalgic Antiquarianism," Imagining Early Modern London, ed. J.F. Merritt (Cambridge, 2001), p. 42.

ships carrying bullion to pay the troops in the Netherlands were detained by Elizabeth when they took refuge from English pirates. When the Duke of Alba retaliated against English merchants in the Netherlands, Elizabeth seized the bullion. Stow also kept a diary that shows a fascination with "religious weirdos"[1] and incidents of religious persecution. Both the diary and books in Stow's possession have been interpreted as evidence for a Catholicism about which he later grew more circumspect. However, Stow's religious interests were perhaps more indifferent and he makes "a better representative of the silent majority of lay people than clerical scholars whose historical writings reflect readily identifiable vested interest."[2]

Stow's Survey of London, begun in 1590 and published in 1598, typically combines tradition with a more critical historiography to produce a chorography, an historical, geographical, topographical, and cultural description of a particular place.[3] Arranged as a perambulation through the streets of London, this first scholarly history of an English town proceeds chronologically within a spatial framework based on the actual layout of the city. For each ward, Stow includes a brief account of its name and history, delineates its boundaries, and lists its principal inhabitants and notable events. From these descriptions emerges an ideal of the city as a natural hierarchy characterized by strong bonds of loyalty between top and bottom.[4] Throughout, Stow's criticism is typically directed at evidence for the decay of this stable tradition, as he frequently notes post-Reformation destruction of tomb monuments or decries encroachment on common lands and the destruction of old-style community through the abandonment of the great houses and development of more slums.[5] Missing from the Survey is systematic discussion of either the city's relationship to the central government of the country or its internal administrative structures.[6] Both Stow's lack of interest in city politics and his nostalgia for an ideal London of yesteryear are expressed by his verbatim use of William Fitzstephen's late twelfth-century Descriptio Nobilissimae Civitatis Londoniae ("A Description of the Most Noble City of London") for some of the more general descriptions of civic traditions and honours. However, while he includes Fitzstephen's work in its entirety, Stow casts a critical eye at others' sources, questioning, for example, the tradition that Julius Caesar founded the Tower of London. That neither the 1598 nor the 1603 edition of the Survey was issued with a formal introduction or maps indicates the degree to which it is a work by a Londoner for an audience of Londoners.[7] The authority of Stow's loveletter to England's capital was such that it was revised and enlarged, to the point of being unrecognizable, through the eighteenth century.

EDITION: A survay of London contayning the originall, antiquity, increase, moderne estate, and description of that citie, written in the yeare 1598. by John Stow citizen of London. London: Imprinted by [John Windet] for John Wolfe, 1598. STC 23341.

1 Collinson, "John Stow and Nostalgic Antiquarianism," p. 43.

2 Beer, Tudor England Observed, p. 18

3 B. Shapiro, A Culture of Fact: England, 1550-1720 (Ithaca, 2000), p. 65.

4 I. Archer, "The Nostalgia of John Stow," The Theatrical City: Culture, Theatre and Politics in London, 1576-1649, ed. D.L. Smith, R. Strier, and D. Bevington (Cambridge, 1995), p. 19.

5 Ibid., pp. 21-22.

6 Beer, Tudor England Observed, p. 143.

7 Ibid., p. 129.

from A Survey of London

To the Right Honourable, the Lord Mayor of the City of London, to the Commonalty[1] and Citizens of the Same, John Stow, Citizen, Wisheth Long Health and Felicity.

Since the first publishing of the perambulation of Kent,[2] by that learned gentleman, Mr. William Lambert, esquire, I have heard of sundry other able persons to have, according to the desire of that author, assayed[3] to do somewhat for the particular shires and counties where they were born or dwelt, of which none that I know, saving Mr. Norden[4] for the counties of Middlesex and Hertford, have vouchsafed their labours to the common good in that behalf. And therefore concurring with the first in the same desire to have drawn together such special descriptions of each place, as might not only make up an whole body of the English chronography[5] amongst ourselves, but also might give occasion and courage to Mr. Camden[6] to increase and beautify his singular work of the whole to the view of the learned that be abroad, I have attempted the discovery of London, my native soil and country, at the desire and persuasion of some my good friends, as well because I have seen sundry antiquities myself touching that place, as also for that, through search of records to other purposes, diverse written helps are come to my hands, which few others have fortuned to meet withal,[7] it is a service that most agreeth with my professed travels. It is a duty that I willingly owe to my native mother and country and an office that of right I hold myself bound in love to bestow upon the politic body and members of the same; what London hath been of ancient time, men may here see, as what it is now, every man doth behold. I know that the argument, being of the chief and principal city of the land, required the pen of some excellent artisan, but fearing that none would attempt and finish it, as few have assayed any, I chose rather, amongst other my labours, to handle it after my plain manner than to leave it unperformed. Touching the dedication, I am not doubtful where to seek my patron, since you be a politic estate of the city as the walls and buildings be the material parts of the same. To you, therefore, do I address this my whole labour, as well that by your authority I may be protected as warranted by your own skill and understanding of that which I have written. I confess that I lacked my desire to the accomplishment of some special parts, but I trust hereafter that shall be supplied and I profess, if more touching this work come unto me, to afford it in all duty. In the meantime, I recommend this to your view, my labours to your consideration, and myself to your service, as I have professed during life, in this or any other.

The Antiquity of London

As Rome, the chief city of the world, to glorify itself drew her original from the gods, goddesses, and demi-gods, by the Trojan progeny,[8] so this famous city of London, for greater glory and in emulation of Rome, deriveth itself from the very same original. For, as Geoffrey of Monmouth,[9] the Welsh historian, reporteth, Brute, descended from the demi-god Aeneas, the son of Venus, daughter of Jupiter, about the year of the world 2855, the year before Christ's nativity 1108,

---

1 Commonalty people of a nation, state, city, etc., collectively; a community, commonwealth.

2 perambulation of Kent William Lambert's survey of Kent (1576).

3 assayed attempted, endeavoured.

4 Mr. Norden John Norden (1548-?1625) produced a series of historical and geographical surveys of English counties, as well as the best maps of London and Westminster under the Tudors.

5 chronography description of past time (i.e., chronicle).

6 Mr. Camden William Camden (1551-1623) was a chronicler whose Britannia (1586) and Annales Rerum Anglicarum et Hibernicarum Annales regnante Elizabetha (1615 and 1625) were very popular.

7 withal in addition, as well.

8 Trojan progeny Aeneas, who ended his travels near the site on which Rome was founded, was a Trojan who escaped after the fall of Troy.

9 Geoffrey of Monmouth (c. 1100-54); his History of the Kings of Britain (1136-38) chronicles the period from 1100 BCE to 689 CE and traces the origins of the nation to Brutus, the great-grandson of Aeneas, who sailed to Albion, the island that became Britain.

builded a city near unto a river now called Thames and named it Troynovant or Trenovant.[1]

King Lud[2] afterward not only repaired this city, but also added fair buildings, towers, and walls, and called it after his owne name Cair-Lud or Lud's town, and the strong gate which he builded in the west part of the city he likewise for his own honour named it Ludgate.

This Lud had issue two sons, Androgeus and Themantius, who, being not of age to govern at the death of their father, their uncle Cassibilan[3] took upon him the crown, about the eighth year of whose reign Julius Caesar arrived in this land with a great power of Romans to conquer it, the manner of which conquest I will summarily set down out of his own Commentaries,[4] which are of far better credit than the relations of Geoffrey Monmouth.

The chief government of the Britons and ordering of the wars was then by common advice committed to Cassibilan, whose seigniory[5] was separated from the cities towards the sea coast by the river called Thames about fourscore miles from the sea. This Cassibilan in times past had made continual war upon the cities adjoining, but the Britons, being moved with the Romans' invasion, had resolved in that necessity to make him their sovereign and general of the wars, which continued hot between the Romans and them, but in the meanwhile, the Trinovantes,[6] which was then the strongest city well near of all those countries, and out of which city a young gentleman called Mandubrace,[7] upon confidence of Caesar's help, came unto him into the main land of Gallia, now called France, and thereby escaped death which he should have suffered at Cassibilan's hand, sent their ambassadors to Caesar, promising to yield unto him and to do what he should command them, instantly desiring him to protect Mandubrace from the furious tyranny of Cassibilan and to send him into their city with authority to take the government thereof upon him. Caesar accepted the offer and appointed them to give unto him 40 hostages and withal to find him grain for his army, and so sent he Mandubrace unto them.

When others saw that Caesar had not only defended the Trinovantes against Cassibilan, but had also saved them harmless from the pillage of his own soldiers, then did the Conimagues, Segontians, Ancalits, Bibrokes, and Cassians[8] likewise submit themselves unto him and by them he learned that not far from thence was Cassibilan's town, fortified with woods and marish[9] ground, into the which he had gathered a great number both of men and cattle.

For the Britons call that a town, sayeth Caesar, when they have fortified a cumbersome wood with a ditch and rampire, and there they resort to abide the approach of their enemies. To this place therefore marched Caesar with his legions. He found it excellently fortified both of nature and by man's advice; nevertheless he resolved to assault it in two several places at once, whereupon the Britons being not able to endure the force of the Romans, fled out at another part, and left the town unto him. A great number of cattle he found there and many of the Britons he slew, and other he took in the chase.

Whilst these things were a doing in these quarters, Cassibilan sent messengers into Kent, which lieth upon the sea, in which there reigned then

---

1 Troynovant or Trenovant i.e., New Troy.

2 King Lud In 73 BCE, Lud fortified New Troy and annexed neighbouring lands to it.

3 Cassibilan Cassivelaunus led British resistance in a guerilla war against Julius Caesar during Caesar's second expedition (54 BCE) but was defeated.

4 Commentaries Julius Caesar's Commentaries on the Gallic Wars (50 BCE) give accounts of his invasions of Britain.

5 seigniory territory, dominion.

6 Trinovantes The Trinovantes were a tribe that neighboured Cassivelaunus' Catuvellauni.

7 Mandubrace Mandubracius, son of the former king of the Trinovantes killed by Cassivelaunus.

8 Conimagues ... Cassians These tribes are mentioned in Caesar's Commentaries. The Iceni ruled an area roughly consistent with modern-day Norfolk, while the Segonti occupied an area around modern-day Carnarvon in Wales. The Cassi may have been precursors of the Catuvellauni, but the others are unknown.

9 marish i.e., marsh.

four particular kings, named Cingetorix, Carvil, Faximagul, and Segonax,[1] whom he commanded to raise all their forces and suddenly to set upon and assault the Romans in their trenches by the seaside, the which when the Romans perceived, they sailed out upon them, slew a great sort of them, and, taking Cingetorix, their noble captain, prisoner, retired themselves to their camp in good safety.

When Cassibilan heard of this and had formerly taken many other losses and found his country sore wasted and himself left almost alone by the defection of the other cities, he sent ambassadors by Connius of Arras to Caesar to entreat with him concerning his won submission, the which Caesar did accept and, taking hostages, assessed the realm of Britain to a yearly tribute to be paid to the people of Rome, giving straight charge to Cassibilan that he should not seek any revenge upon Mandubrace or the Trinovantes, and so withdrew his army to the sea again. [...]

[...] the Britons, I know, had no skill of building with stone, as it may appear by that which followeth about year after Christ, 399, when Arcadius and Honorius, the sons of Theodosius Magnus,[2] governed the Empire, the one in the east, the other in the west, for Honorius having received Britain, the city of Rome was invaded and destroyed by the Goths,[3] after which time the Romans left to rule in Britain as being employed in defence of their territories nearer home, whereupon the Britons, not able to defend themselves against the invasions of their enemies, were many years together under the oppression of two most cruel nations, the Scots and Picts,[4] and at length were forced to send their ambassadors with letters and lamentable supplications to come, requiring aid and succour from thence, upon promise of their continual fealty,[5] so that the Romans would rescue them out of the hands of their enemies. Hereupon the Romans sent unto them a legion of armed soldiers, which coming into this island and encountering with the enemies, overthrew a great number of them, and drove the rest out of the frontiers of the country, and so setting the Britons at liberty, counselled them to make a wall, extending all along between the two seas, which might be of force to keep out their evil neighbours, and then returned home with great triumph, but the Britons, wanting masons, builded that wall not of stone as they were advised, but made it of turf, and that so slender that it served little or nothing at all for their defence and, the enemy perceiving that the Roman legion was returned home, forthwith[6] arrived out of their boats, invaded the borders, overcame the country, and, as it were, bore down all that was before them.

Whereupon ambassadors were eftsoons[7] dispatched to Rome, lamentably beseeching that they would not suffer their miserable country to be utterly destroyed. Then again another legion was sent, which, coming upon a sudden, made a great slaughter of the enemy, and chased him home, even unto his own country. These Romans at their departure told the Britons plainly that it was not for their ease or leisure to take upon them any more such long and laborious journeys for their defence, and therefore had them practice the use of armour and weapons and learn to withstand their enemies, whom nothing else did make so strong as their[8] faint heart and cowardice, and for so much as they thought that it would be no small [1] Cingetorix ... Segonax Cingetorix, Carvilius, Taximagulus, and Segovax, the kings of the Cantiaci mentioned by Caesar, who ruled the southeast tip of Britain.

[2] Arcadius ... Theodosius Magnus Flavius Theodosius (c. 346-95) was made fellow-emperor with Gratian and controlled the eastern part of the empire, including eastern Europe and Asia. After the death of Gratian's half-brother, Valentinian II, his sons governed the two halves of the empire (OCD).

[3] Goths Germanic tribe from an area between Poland and the Ukraine, whose leader, Alaric, stormed and sacked the city of Rome in 410.

[4] Scots and Picts enemies of the southern Britons who conducted repeated invasions of Roman Britain that necessitated the construction of Hadrian's Wall and, later, the Antonine Wall.

[5] fealty obligation of fidelity.

[6] forthwith immediately, at once.

[7] eftsoons soon afterwards.

[8] their i.e., the Britons.

help and encouragement unto their tributary[1] friends whom they were now forced to forsake, they builded for them a wall of hard stone from the west sea to the east sea, right between those two cities which were there made to keep out the enemies, in the selfsame place where Severus[2] before had cast his trench, the Britons also putting to their helping hands as labourers.

This wall they builded eight foot thick in breadth and twelve foot in height, right as it were by a line, from east to west, as the ruins thereof remaining in many places till this day do make to appear. Which work thus perfected, they give the people straight charge to look well to themselves, they teach them to handle their weapons and they instruct them in warlike feats. And lest by the seaside southwards where their ships lay at harbour the enemies should come on land, they made up sundry bulwarks, each somewhat distant from the other, and so bid them farewell as minding no more to return. This happened in the days of the Emperor Theodosius the Younger,[3] almost 500 years after the first arrival of the Romans here, about the year after Christ's incarnation 434.

[...]

Houses of Students of the Common Law.

But besides all this there is in and about this city a whole university, as it were, of students, practicers or pleaders, and judges of the laws of this realm, not living of common stipends,[4] as in other universities it is for the most part done, but of their own private maintenance, as being altogether fed either by their places or practice or otherwise by their proper revenue or exhibition[5] of parents and friends, for that the younger sort are either gentlemen, or the sons of gentlemen, or of other most wealthy persons. Of these houses, there be at this day fourteen in all, whereof nine do stand within the liberties[6] of the city, and five in the suburbs thereof. [...] One other Inn of Chancery sometime there was, called Chester's Inn for the nearness to the Bishop of Chester's house, but more commonly termed Strand Inn, for that it stood near to the Strand Bridge without Temple Bar, the which and other dwelling houses near adjoining were pulled down in the reign of King Edward the Sixth, by Edward, duke of Somerset[7] and protector of the realm, who in place thereof raised that beautiful, but yet unperfect, house called Somerset House. There was moreover in the reign of King Henry the Sixth,[8] a tenth house of Chancery, mentioned by Justice Fortscue in his book of the Laws of England,[9] but where it stood or when it was abandoned I cannot find, and therefore I will leave it and return to the rest.

The houses of Court be replenished partly with young students and partly with graduates and practicers of the law, but the Inns of Chancery, being as it were, provinces, severally subjected to the Inns of Court,[10] be chiefly furnished with officers, attorneys, soliciters, and clerks that follow the courts of the King's Bench[11] or common

---

1 tributary paying tax imposed by one prince or state on another in acknowledgement of submission or as the price of peace, security, and protection.

2 Severus Septimius Severus (193-211) was the founder of the African dynasty of Roman emperors who arrived in Britain in 208 in an attempt to quell the Scots by force. His effort was both brutal and unsuccessful, although his son forced the tribes into a peace treaty after Severus' death (OCD).

3 Theodosius the Younger Theodosius II (401-50), grandson of Flavius Theodosius (OCD).

4 stipends allowances.

5 exhibition allowance of money.

6 liberties districts, extending beyond the bounds of the city, which are subject to the control of the municipal authority.

7 Edward, duke of Somerset Edward Seymour (1506?-52), uncle of the young Edward VI and head of the council of regency that ruled in his place.

8 reign of King Henry the Sixth 1422-61 and 1470-71.

9 Fortscue ... Laws of England John Fortescue (c. 1395-c. 1477), chief justice of the King's Bench (1442), wrote De laudibus legum Angliae ("In Praise of the Laws of England") as an instructional work for Edward, Prince of Wales (1453-71). It was not printed until the sixteenth century, when it became very popular.

10 Inns of Chancery ... Inns of Court the system of legal education began with study in the Inns of Chancery, from which students progressed to the Inns of Court and being called to the bar.

11 courts of the King's Bench the highest court of law in Britain, originally the principal court for hearing criminal cases and disputes between citizens and the monarch.

place. And yet there want not some other being young students that come thither, sometimes from one of the universities, and sometimes immediately from grammar schools, and these having spent some time in studying upon the first elements and grounds of the law and having performed the exercises of their own houses, called bolts, moots,[1] and putting of cases, they proceed to be admitted and become students in some of these four houses or Inns of Court, where continuing by the space of seven years or thereabouts, they frequent readings, meetings, boltings, and other learned exercises, whereby growing ripe in the knowledge of the laws and approved withal to be of honest conversation, they are either by the general consent of the benchers,[2] or readers,[3] being of the most ancient, grave, and judicial men of every Inn of the Court, or by the special privilege of the present reader there, selected and called to the degree of utter barristers,[4] and so enabled to be common counsellors and to practise the law, both in their chambers and at the bars. Of these after that they be called to a further step of preferment, called the bench, there are twain[5] every year chosen among the benchers of every Inn of Court to be readers there, who do make their readings at two times in the year also, that is, one in Lent and the other at the beginning of August.

And for the help of young students in every of the Inns of Chancery, they do likewise choose out of every one Inn of Court a reader, being no bencher but an utter barrister there of ten or twelve years continuance and of good profit in study. Now from these of the said degree of counsellors, or utter barristers, having continued therein the space of fourteen or fifteen years at the least, the chiefest and best learned are by the benchers elected to increase the number, as I said, of the bench amongst them, and so in their time do become first single and then double readers to the students of those houses of Court, after which last reading they be named apprentices at the law and, in default of a sufficient number of sergeants at law,[6] these are, at the pleasure of the prince, to be advanced to the places of sergeants, out of which number of sergeants also the void places of judges are likewise ordinarily filled, albeit[7] now and then some be advanced by the special favour of the prince to the estate, dignity and place, both of sergeant and judge, as it were in one instant. But from thenceforth they hold not any room in those Inns of Court, being translated to one of the said two Inns, called Sergeants' Inns, where none but the sergeants and judges do converse.

Of Orders and Customs

Of orders and customs in this city of old time Fitzstephen[8] sayeth as followeth: "Men of all trades, sellers of all sorts of wares, labourers in every work every morning are in their distinct and several places. Furthermore, in London upon the riverside, between the wine in ships and the wine to be sold in taverns is a common cookery or cooks' row, there daily for the season of the year, men might have meat (roast, sod[9] or fried), fish, flesh, fowls fit for rich and poor. If any come suddenly to any citizen from afar, weary and not willing to tarry[10] till the meat be bought and dressed, while the servant bringeth water for his master's hands and fetcheth bread, he shall have immediately from the river's side all viands[11] whatsoever he desireth, what multitude soever, either of soldiers or strangers, do come to the city, what-

[1] bolts, moots cases put forward for discussion by students (i.e., moot court).

[2] benchers senior members of the Inns of Court.

[3] readers teachers, lecturers.

[4] utter barristers lawyers who argue cases at the bar.

[5] twain two.

[6] sergeants at law members of a superior order of barristers, from which, until 1873, the common law judges were always chosen.

[7] albeit although.

[8] Fitzstephen William Fitzstephen (d. c. 1190) wrote a Life of Thomas Becket prefaced by a description of the city of London.

[9] sod boiled.

[10] tarry delay, wait.

[11] viands food.

soever hour day or night according to their pleasures may refresh themselves, and they which delight in delicateness may be satisfied with as delicate dishes there as may be found elsewhere. And this cooks' row is very necessary to the city and, according to Plato in Gorgias,[1] next to physic[2] is the office of cooks as part of a city."

Without one of the gates is a plain field, both in name and deed, where every Friday, unless it be a solemn bidden[3] holy day, is a notable show of horses to be sold. Earls, barons, knights, and citizens repair thither to see or to buy. There may you with pleasure see amblers[4] pacing it delicately; there may ye see trotters[5] fit for men of arms sitting more hardly; there may you have notable young horse not yet broken; there may you have strong steeds, well-limbed geldings whom the buyers do especially regard for pace and swiftness. The boys which ride these horses, sometime two, sometime three, do run races for wagers, with a desire of praise or hope of victory. In another part of that field are to be sold all implements of husbandry,[6] as also fat swine, milch kine,[7] sheep, and oxen. There stand also mares and horses fit for ploughs and teams, with their young colts by them. At this city, merchant strangers of all nations had their quays and wharfs. The Arabians sent gold, the Sabians spice and frankincense, the Scythian armour, Babylon oil, Indian purple garments, Egypt precious stones, Norway and Russia ambergris[8] and sables,[9] and the French men wine. According to the truth of chronicles, this city is ancienter than Rome, built of the ancient Trojans and of Brute before that was built by Romulus and Remus[10] and therefore useth the ancient customs of Rome. This city, even as Rome, is divided into wards. It hath yearly sheriffs instead of consuls; it hath the dignity of senators in aldermen. It hath under-officers, common sewers, and conduits in streets; according to the quality of causes, it hath general courts and assemblies upon appointed days. I do not think that there is any city wherein are better customs in frequenting the churches, in serving God, in keeping holy days, in giving alms, in entertaining strangers, in solemnizing marriages, in furnishing banquets, celebrating funerals, and burying dead bodies.

The only plagues of London is immoderate quaffing[11] among the foolish sort and often casualties by fire. Most part of the bishops, abbots, and great lords of the land have houses there, whereunto they resort and bestow much when they are called to Parliament by the king, or to counsel by their metropolitan,[12] or otherwise by their private business.

Thus far, Fitzstephen of the estate of these things in his time, whereunto may be added the present, by conference whereof, the alteration will easily appear.

Men of trades and sellers of wares in this city have often times since changed their places as they have found their best advantage. For, whereas mercers and haberdashers used to keep their shops in Westcheap, of later time they held them on London Bridge, where partly they yet

---

[1] Plato … Gorgias The dialogue, written c. 380 BCE, addresses the nature and function of rhetoric. Rhetoric is compared to cookery, which Socrates argues "simulates the disguise of medicine, and pretends to know what food is the best for the body; and if the physician and the cook had to enter into a competition in which children were the judges, or men who had no more sense than children, as to which of them best understands the goodness or badness of food, the physician would be starved to death" (Plato, Gorgias, trans. B. Jowett [New York, 1871], n.p.).

[2] physic medicine.

[3] bidden commanded, ordered.

[4] amblers slow horses.

[5] trotters horses trained to trot or move briskly.

[6] husbandry farming.

[7] milch kine milk cow.

[8] ambergris wax-like substance of marbled ashy colour, found floating in tropical seas, and as a morbid secretion in the intestines of the sperm-whale. It is odoriferous and used in perfumery.

[9] sables small soft-furred mammals found in the sub-arctic regions of Europe and Asia.

[10] Romulus and Remus mythological twin brothers, sons of Mars and the priestess Rhea Silvia, who were abandoned, suckled by a she-wolf, adopted by a shepherd, and later founded the city of Rome (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

[11] quaffing drinking.

[12] metropolitan archbishop.

remain. The goldsmiths of Gutherons Lane and Old Exchange are now for the most part removed into the south side of Westcheap; the pepperers and grocers of Sopers Lane are now in Bucklersbury and other places; the drapers[1] of Lombard Street and of Cornhill, are seated in Candlewick Street and Watling Street; the skinners[2] from St. Mary Pellipers or at the Axe into Budgerow and Walbrook; the stockfishmongers[3] in Thames Street; wet fishmongers in Knightriders Street and Bridge Street; the ironmongers[4] of Ironmongers Lane and old Jury into Thames Street; the vintners[5] from the Vinetree into diverse places. But the brewers for the more part remain near to the friendly water of Thames, the butchers in Eastcheap and St. Nicholas Shambles. The hosiers[6] of old time in Hosier Lane, near unto Smithfield, are since removed into Cordwainer Street, the upper part thereof by Bow Church, and last of all into Birchovers Lane by Cornhill; the shoemakers and curriers[7] of Cordwainer Street removed the one to St. Martin's Le Grand, the other to London Wall near unto Moorgate; the founders[8] remain by themselves in Lothbury; cooks or wastelers[9] for the more part in Thames Street, the other dispersed into diverse parts. Poulters of late removed out of the Poultry betwixt the Stocks and Great Conduit in Cheap into Grass Street and St. Nicholas Shambles; bowyers[10] from Bowyer Row by Ludgate into diverse places and almost worn out with the fletchers.[11] Pater Noster beadmakers and text writers[12] are gone out of Pater Noster Row into Stationers of Paul's Churchyard; patten makers[13] of St. Margaret Pattens Lane clean worn out. Labourers every workday are to be found in Cheap about Sopers Lane end; horse coursers and sellers of oxen, sheep, swine, and such like, remain in their old market of Smithfield, etc.

That merchants of all nations had their quays and wharfs at this city, whereunto they brought their merchandises before, and in the reign of Henry the Second mine author[14] wrote of his own knowledge to be true, though for the antiquity of the city he took the common opinion. Also that this city was in his time and afore divided into wards, had yearly sheriffs, aldermen, general courts, and assemblies, and such like notes by him set down in commendation of the citizens, whereof there is no question, he wrote likewise of his own experience, as being born and brought up amongst them.

Honour of Citizens and Worthiness of Men in the Same.

This city, sayeth Fitzstephen, is glorious in manhood, furnished with munitions, populous with inhabitants, insomuch that in the troublesome time of King Stephen,[15] it hath showed at a muster twenty thousand armed horsemen and threescore thousand footmen serviceable for the wars. Moreover, sayeth he, the citizens of London, wheresoever they become, are notable before all other citizens in civility of manners, attire, table, and talk. The matrons of this city are

[1] drapers cloth dealers.

[2] skinners ones whose work or business is concerned with the preparation of skins for commercial purposes.

[3] stockfishmongers dealers in fish cured by splitting open and drying hard in the air without salt.

[4] ironmongers dealers in ironware.

[5] vintners wine merchants.

[6] hosiers dealers in stockings and underclothes.

[7] curriers ones whose trade is the dressing and colouring of leather after it is tanned.

[8] founders ones who found or cast metal, or make articles of cast metal.

[9] wastelers bakers of fine breads and cakes.

[10] bowyers makers of bows.

[11] fletchers makers of arrows.

[12] text writers writers of legal documents.

[13] patten makers producers of clogs designed to raise regular shoes above the mud.

[14] mine author i.e., Fitzstephen.

[15] troublesome time of King Stephen Stephen (1097-1154) was the nephew of Henry I, who named his daughter, Empress Mathilda, as his heir. With the assent of the barons, Stephen took the throne and led the country into civil war with forces loyal to Mathilda.

the very modest Sabine ladies of Italy.[1] The Londoners, sometime called Trinovantes, repelled Caesar, which always made his passage by shedding blood, whereupon Lucan sung: "Territa quaesitis ostendit terga Britannis."[2] The city of London hath bred some which have subdued many kingdoms and also the Roman Empire. It hath also brought forth many others whom virtue and valour hath highly advanced, according to Apollo in his oracle to Brute, "sub occasu solis" etc.[3] In the time of Christianity, it brought forth that noble Emperor Constantine (which gave the city of Rome and all the imperial ensigns to God[4]), St. Peter, and Pope Sylvester,[5] choosing rather to be called a defender of the Church than an emperor and, lest peace might be violated and their eyes troubled by his presence, he retired from Rome and built the city of Constantinople. London also in late time hath brought forth famous kings: Maud the Empress,[6] King Henry,[7] son to Henry the Second[8] etc. Thus far Fitzstephen, whereunto may be added innumerable persons of honour, born in London, and actions done by worthy citizens, whereof I will only note a few best known to the commonalty.

[...]

The Singularities[9] of the City of London.

Whatsoever is said of cities generally maketh also for London, specially howbeit these things are particularly for our purpose to be considered in it: the situation; the former estimation that it hath had; the service that it hath done; the present estate and government of it; and such benefits as do grow to the realm by the maintenance thereof. This realm hath only three principal rivers whereon a royal city may well be situated: Trent in the north, Severn in the southwest, and Thames in the south east, of the which Thames, both for the straight course in length reacheth furthest into the belly of the land and for the breadth and stillness of the water, is most navigable up and down the stream, by reason whereof, London, standing almost in the middle of that course, is more commodiously[10] served with provision of necessaries than any town standing upon any of the other two rivers can be and both also more easily communicate to the rest of the realm the commodities of her own intercourse and traffic. This river openeth indifferently[11] upon France and Flanders, our mightiest neighbours, to whose doings we ought to have a bent eye and special regard, and this city standeth thereon in such convenient distance from the sea, as it is not only near enough for intelligence of the affairs of those princes and for the resistance of their attempts, but also sufficiently removed from the fear of any sudden dangers that may be offered by them, whereas for the prince of this realm to dwell upon Trent were to turn his back, or blind side, to his most dangerous borderers and for him to rest and dwell upon Severn were to be shut up in a cumbersome corner, which openeth but upon Ireland only, a place of much

[1] Sabine ladies of Italy Romulus populated his newly founded city with a large number of male fugitives and outlaws, which left a dearth of women as brides. As a solution, he invited the nearby Sabines to a festival, at which the Romans seized the women and drove the men away.

[2] Territa quaesitis ostendit terga Britannis Lucan's Pharsalia focusses on the civil wars between Caesar and Pompey and, of Caesar's attempt to conquer Britain, comments that he "unchallenged sought/ Britannia's cliffs; then turned his back in flight" (Pharsalia II, trans. Ridley, 1896).

[3] sub occasu solis etc. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain (1136), Brutus is instructed to go "beyond the setting of the sun" (i.e., west) to found his new Troy.

[4] Emperor Constantine … God Constantine the Great (c. 272/73-337) officially converted the Roman Empire to Christianity (OCD).

[5] Pope Sylvester bishop of Rome during the reign of Constantine.

[6] Maud the Empress Mathilda (1102-67), daughter of Henry I and Empress of Germany who was promised the throne. Her forces briefly deposed Stephen and she ruled for a year (1141-42). Strife continued until Stephen recognized Mathilda's son, later Henry II, as his heir.

[7] King Henry Henry II (1133-89), famous for his conflict with Thomas à Becket, who was finally overthrown by his son, Richard.

[8] son to Henry the Second Richard Lionheart (1157-99), renowned for leading crusades to the Holy Land.

[9] Singularities distinctive or noteworthy things.

[10] commodiously advantageously, profitably.

[11] indifferently equally, alike.

less importance. Neither could London be pitched so commodiously upon any other part of the same river of Thames as where it now standeth. For if it were removed more to the west, it should lose the benefit of the ebbing and flowing[1] and if it were seated more toward the east, it should be nearer to danger of the enemy and further both from the good air and from doing good to the inner parts of the realm. Neither may I omit that none other place is so plentifully watered with springs as London is.

And whereas, amongst other things, corn and cattle, hay and fuel be of great necessity, of the which cattle may be driven from afar and corn may easily be transported. But hay and fuel, being of greater bulk and burthen,[2] must be had at hand, only London, by the benefit of this situation and river, may be sufficiently served therewith. In which respect, an alderman of London reasonably, as me thought, affirmed that although London received great nourishment by the residence of the prince, the repair of the Parliament, and courts of justice, yet it stood principally by the advantage of the situation upon the river, for when, as on a time it was told him by a courtier, that Queen Mary, in her displeasure against London, had appointed to remove with the Parliament and term to Oxford, this plain man demanded whether she meant also to divert the river of Thames from London or no, and when the gentleman had answered no, then quoth the alderman, "By God's grace we shall do well enough at London, whatsoever become of the term and Parliament." I myself being then a young scholar at Oxford did see great preparation made towards that term and Parliament and do well remember that the common opinion and voice was that they were not holden there because provision of hay could not be made in all the country to serve for ten whole days together, and yet is that quarter plentifully stored with hay for the proportion of the shire itself.

[...] The quality of this city consisteth either in the law and government thereof or in the degrees and condition of the citizens, or in their strength and riches.

It is besides the purpose to dispute whether the estate of the government here be a democratic or aristocratic, for whatsoever it be, being considered in itself, certain it is that in respect of the whole realm, London is but a citizen and no city, a subject and no free estate, an obedientiary[3] and no place endowed with any distinct or absolute power, for it is governed by the same law that the rest of the realm is, both in causes criminal and civil, a few customs only excepted, which also are to be adjudged, or forejudged, by the common law. And in the assembly of the estates of our realm, which we call Parliament, they are but a member of the commonalty and send two burgesses for their city, as every poor borough doth, and two knights for their county as every other shire doth, and are as straitly[4] bound by such laws as any part of the realm is, for if contribution in subsidy of money to the prince be decreed, the Londoners have none exemption, no not so much as to assess themselves, for the prince doth appoint the commissioners. [...]

Thus much then of the estate of London, in the government thereof, in the condition of the citizens, and in their power and riches. Now follow the enumeration of such benefits as redound[5] to the prince and this realm by this city, in which doing I profess not to rehearse all, but only to recite and run over the chief and principal of them. Besides the commodities of the furtherance of religion and justice, the propagation of learning, the maintenance of arts, the increase of riches, and the defence of countries, all which are before showed to grow generally by cities and be common to London with them, London bringeth singularly these good things following.

---

1 ebbing and flowing The Thames is a tidal river.

2 burthen i.e., burden.

3 obedientiary subject.

4 straitly narrowly, tightly.

5 redound abound, overflow.

By advantage of the situation it disperseth foreign wares, as the stomach doth meat, to all the members most commodiously.

By benefit of the river of Thames and great trade of merchandise, it is the chief maker of mariners and nurse of our navy, and ships, as men know, be the wooden walls for defence of our realm. [...]

It only of any place in this realm is able to furnish the sudden necessity with a strong army. It availeth the prince in tonnage, poundage,[1] and other her customs much more than all the rest of the realm. [...]

It only doth and is able to make the prince a ready prest or loan of money. It only is found fit and able to entertain strangers honourably and to receive the prince of the realm worthily.

Almighty God, qui nisi custodiat civitatem, frustra vigilat custos,[2] grant that her Majesty evermore rightly esteem and rule this city and he give grace that the citizens may answer duty, as well towards God and her Majesty as towards this whole realm and country. Amen.

—1598

[1] tonnage, poundage taxes levied on wine imported in casks.

[2] qui nisi custodiat civitatem, frustra vigilat custos Latin, "who, unless he guards the city, the watchman watches in vain."

Thomas Deloney
d. in or before 1600

Of Thomas Deloney's personal life very few facts are known: he was originally a silk-weaver by profession, but critics differ about his birthplace, some saying London and others Norwich. He seems to have been living in London in the 1580s, and was probably married sometime before 1586, since there is a baptismal record for his son, Richard, recorded at St Giles, London on 16 October 1586. Deloney "evidently received a grammar school education, given that he published translations from Latin," and may also have produced a translation of a French text (Bonaventure's Les contes ou les nouvelles récréations et joyeux devis [The Mirror of Mirth and Pleasant Conceits]).[1] Of his life as a professional writer equally little is known.

Deloney was one of the most popular English ballad-writers of the sixteenth-century, and the acknowledged successor to the great William Elderton, writing on such topics as contemporary murders and executions, the Spanish Armada, as well as other historical figures and events. It is largely as a ballad-writer that he enters contemporary literary discussion: Thomas Nashe remembers him as that "ballading silk-weaver, [who] hath rhyme enough for all miracles."[2] Clown and actor William Kemp treats Deloney as a member of the company of vulgar, ballad-writing "hacks," but also as a man to be praised for his personal honesty and relative respectability (see p. 1055, ll. 693-703). However, the writer Robert Greene mentions Deloney with scorn in Groatsworth of Wit, where his prose fictions are criticized for presuming to correct those historians and chroniclers who did not see fit to mention the middle-class artisans and merchants on which Deloney focuses. Likewise, Gabriel Harvey dismisses Deloney as one of "the common pamphleteers of London," pointedly suggesting that Nashe "boast less with Thomas Deloney" and "achieve more with Thomas More."[3]

Deloney seems to have worked simultaneously as a writer and a silk-weaver, but in the 1590s he became embroiled in a conflict between London's native weavers and those who had recently immigrated from France and the Netherlands, a conflict which saw him briefly imprisoned as one of the weavers who protested these immigrant workers' flouting of apprenticeship laws.[4] In 1596, the lord mayor of London received complaints about one of Deloney's ballads concerning the scarcity of corn in the kingdom, a ballad that aroused the authorities' ire by representing the Queen herself speaking to her people about the situation. The outcome of this complaint is unknown, although the lord mayor was unsuccessful in tracking Deloney down. Shortly thereafter, Deloney turned his hand to the prose fiction for which he was equally popular in the late-sixteenth and seventeenth centuries and most famous today. These prose narratives feature characters from the middle ranks of Elizabethan society: weavers in Jack of Newbury (entered in the Stationer's Register, 1596-97; earliest extant edition, 1619), shoemakers in The Gentle Craft (entered SR, 1597), and clothiers in Thomas of Reading (entered SR, 1602; earliest extant edition, 1612). These works were clearly popular: there are no existing first editions, nor are there first editions of his collections of ballads, Strange Histories (earliest extant edition, 1607) and The Garland of Good Will (earliest surviving copy [fragmentary], 1604), suggesting that early copies of Deloney's works were literally "read to pieces." Like the prose works of Thomas Nashe, Deloney's fictions represent and address the new urban reading public.

EDITIONS: "The Queenes visiting of the campe at Tilsburie with her entertainment there To the tune of Wilsons wilde." Imprinted at London: By John Wolfe for Edward White, 1588. STC 6565; Thomas of Reading. Or, The sixe worthy yeomen of the west. London: Printed [by R. Blower] for T[homas] P[avier], 1612. STC 6569.

---

1 P. Salzman, DNB online, 2005.

2 The Works of Thomas Nashe, ed. R.B. McKerrow, rev. F.P. Wilson, 5 vols. (Oxford, 1966), vol. 3, p. 84.

3 Pierce's Supererogation, 1593 (London, 1970), pp. 183-84.

4 M.E. Lawliss, Introduction, The Novels of Thomas Deloney, 1961; ctd. in Salzman, DNB online, 2005.

ADDITIONAL ONLINE TEXTS: Thomas Deloney. From Jack Newberry (1596-97; 1626).

The Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilsbury with Her Entertainment There.[1]

To the Tune of "Wilsons Wilde."

Within the year of Christ our Lord
a thousand and five hundreth full:
And eighty-eight by just record
the which no man may disannul.
And in the thirtieth year remaining,
of good Queen Elizabeth's reigning,
A mighty power there was prepared by Philip, then the King of Spain
Against the maiden Queen of England, which in peace before did reign.

Her royal ships to sea she sent to guard the coast on every side,
And seeing how her foes were bent,
her realm full well she did provide:
With many thousands so prepared as like was never erst declared,
Of horsemen and of footmen plenty,
whose good hearts full well is seen:
In the safeguard of their country,
and the service of our Queen.

In Essex fair that fertill[2] soil,
upon the hill of Tilsbury:
To give our Spanish foes the foil,
in gallant camp they now do lie.
Where good orders is ordained,
and true justice eke maintained,
For the punishment of persons,
that are lewd or badly bent.
To see a sight so strange[3] in England,
'twas our gracious Queen's intent.

And on the eight of August she,
from fair St James[4] took her way:
With many lords of high degree,
in princely robes and rich array.
And to barge upon the water,
being King Henry's royal daughter,
She did go with trumpets sounding,
and with dubbing drums apace,[5]
Along the Thames that famous river, for to view the camp a space.[6]

When she as far as Gravesend[7] came, right over against that pretty town,
Her royal Grace with all her train,
was landed there with great renown.
The lords and captains of her forces,
mounted on their gallant horses,
Ready stood to entertain her,
like martial men of courage bold:
"Welcome to the camp, dread Sovereign."
thus they said both young and old.

The bulworks[8] strong that stood thereby,
well guarded with sufficient men:
Their flags were spread courageously, their cannons were discharged then.

---

[1] Entered in Stationers' Register, 10 August 1588. The Queen visited the army, which had been stationed at Tilbury on August 8 and 9 of that year to await the expected arrival of a Spanish invasion force; her famous speech to the troops there took place on 9 August (see pp. 402-03). The remnants of the Spanish Armada, defeated through a combination of English naval skill and bad weather, returned home on 12 August.

[2] fertill fertile.

[3] strange unusual, uncommon, exceptional, singular.

[4] St James' Palace in London, built by Elizabeth's father, Henry VIII and located just across St James' Park from Whitehall Palace.

[5] dubbing an onomatopoeic word, conveying the beating or sound of a drum; apace immediately, quickly (an adverb modifying "go").

[6] space When used without an adjective, "space" usually means a period of short duration.

[7] Gravesend "a port in Kent on the S bank of the Thames, 30 miles below London" (Topographical Dict., p. 231).

[8] bulworks bulwarks: defensive fortifications.

Each gunner did declare his cunning,[1]
for joy conceived of her coming.
All the way her Grace was riding,
on each side stood armed men:
With muskets, pikes, and good caleeveres,[2]
for her Grace's safeguard then.

The Lord General[3] of the field, had there his bloody ancient[4] borne
The Lord Marshal's colours eke,[5] were carried there all rent and torn.
The which with bullets was so burned,
when in Flanders he sojourned.
Thus in warlike wise they marched even as soft as foot could fall:
Because her Grace was fully minded, perfectly to view them all.

Her faithful soldiers great and small,
as each one stood within his place,
Upon their knees began to fall,
desiring God to save her Grace.
For joy whereof her eyes was filled,
that the water down distilled.
"Lord bless you all, my friends," she said,
"but do not kneel so much to me."
Then sent she warning to the rest,
they should not let such reverence be.

Then casting up her princely eyes,
unto the hill with perfect sight,
The ground all covered, she espies,
with feet of armed soldiers bright.

Whereat her royal heart so leaped,
on her feet upright she stepped;
Tossing up her plume of feathers,
to them all as they did stand,
Cheerfully her body bending,
waving of her royal hand.

Thus through the camp she passed quite,
in manner as I have declared.
At Master Rich's[6] for that night,
Her Grace's lodging was prepared.
The morrow after her abiding,
on a princely paulfrey[7] riding,
To the camp she came to dinner,
with her lords and ladies all:
The Lord General went to meet her,
with his guard of yeomen tall.

The sergeant trumpet[8] with his mace,
And nine with trumpets after him,
Bare-headed went before her Grace,
in coats of scarlet colour trim.
The king of heralds tall and comely,
was the next in order duly.
With the famous arms of England,[9]
wrought with rich embroidered gold
On finest velvet blue and crimson, that for silver can be sold.

With maces of clean beaten gold,
the Queen's two sergeants then did ride,
Most comely men for to behold,
in velvet coats and chains beside.
The Lord General then came riding,
and Lord Marshal hard beside him.
Richly were they both attired,
in princely garments of great price,

---

[1] cunning either, generally, "wit, wisdom, intelligence," or, more specifically, "knowledge how to do a thing; ability, skill."

[2] caleeveres calivers; a caliver was a kind of light musket, the lightest portable fire-arm available, excepting the pistol.

[3] The Lord General Robert Dudley, earl of Leicester (?1532-88) was the commander of the ground forces preparing to defend England against the Spanish.

[4] ancient ensign, standard, or flag.

[5] The Lord Marshal (the officer in charge of the camp at Tilbury) was Sir John Norris (c. 1547-97), who had fought in Flanders (the Netherlands) off and on between 1577 and 1587. Leicester had also fought in the Netherlands (1585-86); eke also.

[6] Master Rich Robert Rich, third Lord Rich, later first earl of Warwick (?1559-1619), nobleman and courtier, perhaps most famous as the husband of Penelope Devereux (immortalized by Sidney in Astrophil and Stella). Elizabeth stayed at his house (Little Leighs, Essex).

[7] paulfrey a saddle-horse, especially a small saddle-horse for ladies.

[8] sergeant trumpet sergeant-trumpeter.

[9] I.e., England's coat-of-arms.

Bearing still their hats and feathers in their hands in comely wise.[1]

Then came the Queen on prancing steed attired like an angel bright,
And eight brave footmen at her feet,
whose jerkins were most rich in sight.
Her ladies, likewise of great honour,
most sumptuously did wait upon her,
With pearls and diamonds brave adorned,
and in costly cales[2] of gold:
Her guard in scarlet then rode after,
with bows and arrows stout and bold.

The valiant captains of the field,
mean space[3] themselves in order set:
And each of them with spear and shield,
to join in battle did not let.[4]
With such a warlike skill extended,
as the same was much commended,
Such a battle pitched in England,
many a day hath not been seen.
Thus they stood in order waiting, for the presence of our Queen.

At length her Grace most royally received was and brought again,
Where she might see most loyally
this noble host and warlike train:
How they came marching all together,
like a wood in winter's weather,
With the strokes of drummers sounding,
and with trampling horses than.[5]
The earth and air did sound like thunder, to the ears of every man.

The warlike army then stood still,
and drummers left their dubbing sound,
Because it was our Prince's will,
to ride about the army round.
Her ladies she did leave behind her,
and her guard which still did mind her.[6]
The Lord General and Lord Marshal, did conduct her to each place;
The pikes, the colours, and the lances
at her approach fell down apace.

And then bespoke our noble Queen:
"My loving friends and countrymen,
I hope this day the worst is seen,
that in our wars ye shall sustain.
But if our enemies do assail you,
never let your stomachs[7] fail you.
For in the midst of all your troop,
we ourselves will be in place,
To be your joy, your guide and comfort,
even before your enemies' face."

This done the soldiers all at once,
a mighty shout or cry did give,
Which forced from the azure skies
an echo loud from thence to drive;
Which filled her Grace with joy and pleasure,
and riding then from them by leisure,
With trumpets' sound most loyally, along the court of guard she went,
Who did conduct her Majesty, unto the Lord Chief General's tent,

Where she was feasted royally,
with dainties of most costly price;
And when that night approached nigh,
Her Majesty with sage advice,
In gracious manner then returned,
from the camp where she sojourned.

---

1 comely wise proper, decorous, seemly way.
2 cales cauls, netted caps, or head-dresses, often richly ornamented.
3 mean space in the meantime.
4 let hesitate, delay.
5 than then.
6 which still did mind her i.e., which always gave heed to (her wishes) with the intention of obeying (them).
7 stomachs The stomach was thought the seat of spirit, courage, valour, or bravery.

And when that she was safely set within her barge, and passed away,
Her farewell then the trumpets sounded,
and the cannons fast did play,
T.D.

FINIS.

—1588

from Thomas of Reading. or, The Six Worthy Yeomen of the West.[1]

In the days of King Henry I,[2] who was the first king that instituted the High Court of Parliament,[3] there lived nine men, which for the trade of clothing were famous throughout all England; which art in those days was held in high reputation, both in respect of the great riches that thereby was gotten, as also of the benefit it brought to the whole commonwealth. The younger sons of knights and gentlemen, to whom their fathers would leave no lands, were most commonly preferred to learn this trade, to the end that thereby they might live in good estate, and drive forth their days in prosperity.

Among all crafts this was the only chief, for that it was the greatest merchandise by the which our country became famous through all nations. And it was verily thought that the one half of the people in the land lived in those days thereby, and in such good sort that in the commonwealth there was few or no beggars at all. Poor people, whom God lightly[4] blesseth with most children, did by means of this occupation so order them that by the time that they were come to be six or seven years of age, they were able to get their own bread. Idleness was then banished our coast, so that it was a rare thing to hear of a thief in those days. Therefore, it was not without cause that clothiers were then both honoured and loved, among whom these nine persons in this king's days were of great credit—viz. Thomas Cole of Reading, Gray of Gloucester, Sutton of Salisbury, Fitzalan of Worcester (commonly called William of Worcester), Tom Dove of Exeter, and Simon of Southampton, alias Sup-broth[5]—who were by the King called "The Six Worthy Husbands[6] of the West." Then were there three living in the North: that is to say, Cuthbert of Kendall, Hodgekins of Halifax, and Martin Byram of Manchester.[7] Every one of these kept a great number of servants at work—spinners, carders, weavers, fullers, dyers, shear-

[1] Jack of Newbury's dedication indicates that Thomas of Reading was written after Newbury, and so TR may perhaps be dated to 1598 or 1599. The present extract is based on the earliest extant edition (the fourth edition) of 1612; the title page notes that that edition has been "the fourth time corrected and enlarged."

[2] Henry I (1068-1135; reigned, 1100-35).

[3] the High Court of Parliament "... before this time, the kings of England used but seldom to call together the states of the realm after any certain manner of general kind of process, to have their consents in matters to be decreed. But as the lords of the Privy Council in our time do sit only when necessity requireth, so did they whensoever it pleased the King to have any conference with them. So that from this Henry it may be thought the first use of the Parliament to have proceeded, which sith that time hath remained in force, and is continued unto our times, insomuch that whatsoever is to be decreed touching the state of the commonwealth and conservation thereof, is now referred to that Council. And furthermore, if anything be appointed by the King or any other person to be used for the wealth of the realm, it shall not yet be received as law, till by authority of this assembly it be established" (Raphael Holinshed, Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland, 1587, ed. H. Ellis, 6 vols. [London, 1807-08; rept. New York, 1965], 2.65). Holinshed goes on to give a lengthy description of who sits in Parliament, their functions and the extent of their authority (2.65-66).

[4] lightly slightly, in no great degree. Proverb: "Children are poor men's riches" (Tilley C331).

[5] Sup-broth perhaps in reference to his frugality and unpretentiousness, since broth was a relatively humble dish in the period.

[6] Husband master of a house, male head of a household.

[7] The names listed here differ (with the exception of Thomas of Reading) from those which Deloney gives in the dedication to Jack of Newbury, and critics agree they are almost certainly fictitious as opposed to historical individuals. Deloney, however, does give each character a believable context, since each of the places listed here was important in Tudor cloth production. The Fitzallens and the Byroms or Briams were real families involved in the sixteenth-century wool trade. See F.O. Mann, Works of Thomas Deloney (Oxford, 1912), pp. 548-49.

men, and rowers[1]—to the great admiration of all those that came into their houses to behold them.

Now you shall understand, these gallant clothiers, by reason of their dwelling places, separated themselves in three several[2] companies: Gray of Gloucester, William of Worcester, and Thomas of Reading, because their journey to London was all one way, they conversed commonly together. And Dove of Exeter, Sutton of Salisbury, and Simon of Southhampton, they in like sort kept company the one with the other, meeting ever all together at Basingstoke. And the three northern clothiers did the like, who commonly did not meet till they came to Bosom Inn in London.[3]

Moreover, for the love and delight that these western men had each in other's company, they did so provide that their wains[4] and themselves would ever meet upon one day in London at Jarrat's Hall, surnamed the Giant[5] for that he surpassed all other men of that age, both in stature and strength, whose merriments and memorable deeds, I will set down unto you in this following discourse.

CHAPTER 1

How King Henry Sought the Favour of All His Subjects, Especially of the Clothiers.

This King Henry, who for his great learning and wisdom was called "Beauclark," being the third son to the renowned Conqueror,[6] after the death of his brother William Rufus, took upon him the government of this land, in the absence of his second brother, Robert, duke of Normandy;[7] who at this time was at wars against the infidels, and was chosen King of Jerusalem, the which he, for the love he bore to his own country, refused, and with great honour returned from the Holy Land; of whose coming, when King Henry understood, knowing he would make claim to the crown, sought by all means possible to win the good will of his nobility and to get the favour of the commons by courtesy; for the obtaining whereof he did them many favours, thereby the better to strengthen himself against his brother.[8]

---

[1] All of these occupations are involved in the making of cloth. Carders would prepare the wool for spinning, by using an iron-toothed instrument (the "card") to comb out impurities and part and straighten the fibres; then, the spinners would draw out and twist the fibres of the wool, so as to form a continuous thread; the weaver would then take the thread and using a loom transform it into cloth; the fullers would then tread or beat the cloth for the purpose of cleansing or thickening it; the rowers would then roughen the cloth by raising a nap on it by combing or teasing out a rough layer of projecting threads or fibres on the surface of the woolen fabric; the shearmen would then cut off the superfluous nap of the woolen cloth, smoothing the cloth; finally, the dyers would dye the cloth.

[2] several separate, distinct

[3] Bosom Inn in London Blossoms Inn, a tavern on the W side of Laurence Lane, in Cheapside, London (Topographical Dict., p. 69)

[4] wains wagons, meant to carry heavy loads

[5] Jarrat's Hall, surnamed the Giant otherwise known as Gerald's Hall, "an ancient merchant's house in London, on the south side of Basing Lane off Bread St., Cheapside [...] There was a legend that it was the home of a giant called Gerard, and a fir-pole, 40 ft. long, was preserved in the Hall, which was said to have been his walking staff" (Topographical Dict., p. 218). By 1603 it had become "a common ostrey [i.e., hostelry, inn] for receipt of travelers" (Survey London, 1.348).

[6] the renowned Conqueror William the Conqueror (1028-87; reigned, 1066-87). His third and favourite son inherited the kingdom and became William II (c. 1057-1100; reigned, 1087-1100).

[7] Robert, duke of Normandy (d. 1134), was the eldest son of William the Conqueror; he succeeded his father as duke of Normandy, but was usurped as king of England by his younger brother Henry.

[8] This paragraph is based on the account in Holinshed: "Henry the youngest son of William the first, brother to Rufus lately departed, the first of that name that ruled here in England, and for his knowledge in good literature surnamed Beauclerke, was admitted king by the whole assent of the lords and commons ... This prince had aforehand trained the people to his humor and vein, in bringing them to think well of him, and to conceive a marvelous evil opinion of his brother Duke Robert, persuading them moreover, that the said duke was likely to prove a sharp and rigorous governor, if he once obtained the crown and dominion of the land. Moreover, he caused to be reported for a certain truth, that the same Robert was already created king of Jerusalem. And therefore considering that the kingdom of Palestine (as the rumor ran) was of greater revenues than that of England, there was no cause why they should stay for him, who would not willingly leave the greater for the lesser. By which means the nobility and the commons were the sooner persuaded to decline from the election of the said Robert, and to receive his brother Henry for their lawful king, who on the other side ceased not to promise mountains, till his enterprise took effect; and then at leisure paid some of them with molehills [...] This Henry therefore coming thus to the crown, considered furthermore with (continued)

It chanced on a time, as he, with one of his sons and divers of his nobility, rode from London towards Wales to appease the fury of the Welshmen—which then began to raise themselves in arms against his authority[1]—that he met with a great number of wains loaden[2] with cloth coming to London, and seeing them still drive on one after another so many together, demanded whose they were:

The wainmen answered in this sort: "Cole's of Reading," quoth they.

Then by and by[3] the King asked another, saying: "Whose cloth is all this?"

"Old Cole's," quoth he.

And again anon after he asked the same question to others, and still they answered, "Old Cole's."

And it is to be remembered that the King met them in such a place, so narrow and strait,[4] that he with the rest of his train were fain[5] to stand up close to the hedge whilst the carts passed by; the which at that time being in number above two hundred, was near hand an hour ere the King could get room to be gone; so that by his long stay he began to be displeased, although the admiration of that sight did much qualify his fury. But breaking out in discontent, by reason of his stay, he said he thought Old Cole had got a commission for all the carts in the country to carry his cloth.

"And how if he have?" quoth one of the wainmen. "Doth that grieve you, good sir?"

"Yea, good sir," said our King. "What say you to that?"

The fellow seeing the King (in asking that question) to bend his brows, though he knew not what he was, yet being abashed he answered thus:

"Why, sir, if you be angry, nobody can hinder you; for possible,[6] sir, you have anger at commandment."

The King, seeing him in uttering of his words to quiver and quake, laughed heartily at him, as well in respect of his simple answer, as at his fear. And so soon after the last wain went by, which gave present passage unto him and his nobles, and thereupon entering into communication of the commodity of clothing, the King gave order at his home return to have Old Cole brought before his Majesty, to the intent he might have conference with him, noting him to be a subject of great ability. But by that time he came within a mile of Stanes, he met another company of wains in like sort laden with cloth, whereby the King was driven into a further admiration, and demanding whose they were, answer was made in this sort:

"They be Goodman Sutton's of Salisbury, good sir."

And by that time a score[7] of them were passed, he asked again, saying:

"Whose are these?"

"Sutton's of Salisbury," quoth they. And so still as often as the King asked that question, they answered, "Sutton's of Salisbury."

"God send me many such Suttons," said the King.

---

himself, that hereafter, when his eldest brother Robert should return [...] he would think himself to have had much wrong, and been very evil dealt withal [...] wherefore yer [i.e., before] he should come home out of the holy land [...] the king studied by all possible means how to gratify all the states of his realm, and to plant in their hearts some good opinion of him." The favours included the remitting of some taxes, the reforming and strengthening of some abbeys, and the abolishment of laws made by his father and brother which threatened "the old ancient liberties of the realm of England" (Chronicles, 2.47-48).

" [...] when Christian princes had won Jerusalem, they met together in the temple to choose a king for the government of that city and country, in which convent Duke Robert was chosen before all the residue to be king there, by reason of a miracle (as some have left recorded) wrought by the quenching of a taper, and the sudden kindling thereof again, as he held the same in his hand, standing in the church before the altar amongst other on Easter even: so as thereby it should be thought he was appointed among all the residue to be king, and so was nominated. But he having his mind more inclined to England, refused to take the charge upon him: whereupon after that day he never greatly prospered in any business which he took in hand ..." (Chronicles, 2.49).

[1] Holinshed describes Henry's Welsh wars in 2.50-51. See also p. 1245, note 2.

[2] loaden heavy-laden.

[3] by and by shortly after.

[4] strait synonym for "narrow"; tight, confined.

[5] fain obliged, necessitated.

[6] possible possibly.

[7] score twenty.

And thus the farther he travelled westward, more wains and more he met continually. Upon which occasion he said to his nobles that it would never grieve a king to die for the defence of a fertile country and faithful subjects.

"I always thought," quoth he, "that England's valour was more than her wealth, yet now I see her wealth sufficient to maintain her valour, which I will seek to cherish in all I may, and with my sword keep myself in possession of that I have. Kings and lovers can brook no partners,[1] and therefore let my brother Robert think, that although he was heir to England by birth, yet I am king by possession. All his favourers I must account my foes, and will serve them as I did the ungrateful Earl of Shrewsbury, whose lands I have seized, and banished his body."[2]

But now we will leave the King to his journey into Wales, and, waiting his home return, in the meantime tell you the meeting of these jolly clothiers at London.

[...]

CHAPTER 4

How the King's Majesty Sent for the Clothiers, and of the Sundry Favours Which He Did Them.

King Henry, providing for his voyage into France against King Louis[3] and Robert, duke of Normandy (his own brother), committed the government of the realm in his absence to the Bishop of Salisbury, a man of great wisdom and learning, whom the King esteemed highly,[4] and afterward he thought good to send for the chief clothiers of England, who according to the King's appointment came to the Court, and having licence to come before his Majesty, he spoke to this effect:

"The strength of a king is the love and friendship of his people,[5] and he governs over his realm most surely that ruleth justice with mercy,[6] for he ought to fear[7] many, whom many do fear.[8] Therefore, the governors of the commonwealth ought to observe two special precepts: the one is, that they so maintain the profit of the commons, that whatsoever in their calling they do, they refer it thereunto; the other, that they be always as well careful over the whole commonwealth as over any part thereof, lest while they uphold the one, the other be brought to utter decay. And forasmuch as I do understand, and have partly seen, that you the clothiers of England are no small benefit to the wealth public,[9] I thought it good to know from your own mouths, if there be anything not yet granted that may benefit you, or any other thing to be removed that doth hurt you. The great desire I have to maintain you in your trades hath moved me hereunto. Therefore, boldly say what you would have in the one thing or the other, and I will grant it you."

With that, they all fell down upon their knees, and desired God to save his Majesty, and withal requested three days' respite to put in their answer, which was granted. And thereupon they departed.

---

1 Proverb, "Love and lordship like no fellowship" (Tilley L495).

2 Earl of Shrewsbury ... body In Chapter 2, we learn that the banished Earl of Shrewsbury has been punished for siding with Robert and helping him raise an army against the King. Henry ejects Shrewsbury's wife and children from his estates, including the Earl's daughter Margaret with whom Robert later falls in love. They are all turned out to wander and beg for their subsistence. Deloney does not tell the reader why Shrewsbury was banished in the first place, although Holinshed details the Earl's attempts to foment rebellion in Wales (Chronicles, 2.50-51).

3 Louis VI (1081-1137; reigned 1108-37). There may be some confusion here, since Louis only came to the throne in 1108, a year after Henry had defeated and imprisoned his brother Robert (see Chronicles, 2.56; 59). However, in 1116, Henry invaded Normandy to prevent Louis from seizing the duchy and restoring it to Robert's son, William (2.67).

4 "He had in singular favor above all other of his council, Roger the bishop of Salisbury, a politic prelate, and one that knew how to order matters of great importance, unto whom he committed the government of the realm most commonly whilst he remained in Normandy" (Chronicles, 2.77).

5 The strength ... people Proverb, Reuter, no. 396 (O.R. Reuter, Proverbs, Proverbial Sentences, and Phrases in Thomas Deloney's Works [Helsinki, 1986]).

6 he governs ... mercy Proverb, "To mix justice with mercy" (Reuter, no. 199).

7 fear to be afraid of.

8 Proverb, "Whom many fear must needs fear many" (Reuter, no. 121).

9 wealth public common good, the good of the nation (here, the economic health of the nation).

When the clothiers had well considered of these matters, at length they thought mete[1] to request of his Majesty for their first benefit, that all the cloth-measures through the land might be of one length, whereas to their great disadvantage before, every good town had a several[2] measure; the difficulty thereof was such that they could not keep them in memory, nor know how to keep their reckonings.

The second thing whereof they found themselves grieved was this: that the people would not take cracked money, though it were never so good silver;[3] whereupon, it came to pass that the clothiers and divers other receiving great sums of money do take among it much cracked money. It served them to no use, because it would not go current,[4] but lay upon their hands without profit or benefit, whereof they prayed reformation. The third was a grief whereof Hodgekins of Halifax complained, and that was, that whereas the town of Halifax lived altogether upon clothing, and by the reason of false borderers[5] and other evil-minded persons, they were oft robbed, and had their cloths carried out of their fields, where they were drying, that it would please his Majesty to grant the town this privilege: that whosoever he was that was taken stealing their cloth might presently without any further trial be hanged up.

When the day of their appearance approached, the clothiers came before the King, and delivered up their petition in writing, which his Majesty most graciously perusing said he was ready to fulfill their request; and therefore for the first point of their petition, he called for a staff to be brought him, and measuring thereupon the just length of his own arm delivered it to the clothiers, saying:

"This measure shall be called a yard, and no other measure throughout all the realm of England shall be used for the same,[6] and by this shall men buy and sell, and we will so provide that whosoever he be that abuseth our subjects by any false measure, that he shall not only pay a fine for the same to the king, but also have his body punished by imprisonment. And as concerning the second point of your petition: because of my sudden departure out of the land, I know not better how to ease you of this grief (of cracked money), this decree I make: because they account cracked money not current, I say none shall be current but cracked money. And therefore I will give present charge that all the money through the land shall be slit,[7] and so you shall suffer no loss. But now for your last request for the town of Halifax: where by thieves your clothes are so often stolen from you, seeing the laws already provided in that case are not sufficient to keep men in awe, it is indeed high time to have sharper punishment for them."

With that, Hodgekins unmannerly interrupted the King, saying in broad Northern speech, "Yea, gude faith, mai Leidge, the faule eule[8] of mai saule, giff any thing will keepe them whiat, till the karles be hanged up by the cragge. What the dule care they for boaring their eyne, sea lang as they may gae groping up and downe the countrey like fause lizar lownes, begging and craking?"[9]

The King, smiling to hear this rough-hewn fellow, made this reply: "Content thee, Hodgekins,

---

1 thought mete thought [it] fitting, appropriate.

2 several separate, different.

3 though it were never so good silver In conditional clauses, "never so" denotes an unlimited degree or amount; thus, "though the money was comprised of completely good silver."

4 go current i.e., be accepted as legal tender.

5 borderers those dwelling on the borders of England and Scotland.

6 This order concerning the standardization of cloth measurement is mentioned early in Holinshed's account as one of the favours Henry did for his people in an attempt to ingratiate himself with them and turn them against his brother Robert: "He ordained also that one length of measuring should be used through this realm, which was a yard, appointing it to be cut after the length of his own arm" (Chronicles, 2.48).

7 In his concluding evaluation of Henry's character and reign, Holinshed uses this incident to exemplify Henry's "reformation of certain naughty abuses": "When he heard that such pieces of money as were cracked would not be received amongst the people, although the same were good and fine silver, he caused all the coin in the realm to be either broken or slit" (Chronicles, 2.77).

8 faule eule foul evil, a disease.

9 In modern English: "Yea, good faith, my Liege, the foul evil of my soul if anything will keep them quiet [whiat], till the base fellows [carls] be hanged up by the neck [crag]. What the devil [dule] care for we will have redress for all, and albeit that hanging of men was never seen in England, yet seeing the corrupt world is grown more bold in all wickedness, I think it not amiss to ordain this death for such malefactors; and peculiarly to the town of Halifax I give this privilege: that whosoever they find stealing their cloth, being taken with the goods, that without further judgement they shall be hanged up."[1]

"Thus," said our King, "have I granted what you request, and if hereafter you find any other thing that may be good for you, it shall be granted; for no longer would I desire to live among you, than I have care for the good of the commonwealth."

At which word ended, the King rose from his royal throne, while the clothiers on their knees prayed for both his health and happy success, and showed themselves most thankful for his Highness' favour. His Majesty, bending his body towards them, said that at his home return, he would (by the grace of God) visit them.

[...]

CHAPTER 6

How Simon's Wife of Southampton, Being Wholly Bent to Pride and Pleasure, Requested Her Husband to See London, Which Being Granted, How She Got Goodwife Sutton of Salisbury to Go with Her, Who Took Crab to Go along with Them, and How He Prophesied of Many Things.

The clothiers being all come from London, Simon's wife of Southampton, who was with her husband very merry and pleasant, broke her mind unto him in this sort:

"Good Lord, husband, will you never be so kind as let me go to London with you? Shall I be penned up in Southampton, like a parrot in a cage, or a capon in a coop? I would request no more of you in lieu of all my pains, cark, and care, but to have one week's time to see that fair city. What is this life if it be not mixed with some delight? And what delight is more pleasing than to see the fashions and manners of unknown places? Therefore, good husband, if thou lovest me, deny not this simple request. You know I am no common gadder,[2] nor have oft troubled you with travel. God knows, this may be the last thing that ever I shall request at your hands."

"Woman," quoth he, "I would willingly satisfy your desire, but you know it is not convenient for both of us to be abroad; our charge is so great, and therefore our care ought not to be small. If you will go yourself, one of my men shall go with you, and money enough you shall have in your purse; but to go with you myself, you see my business will not permit me."

"Husband," said she, "I accept your gentle offer, and it may be I shall entreat my gossip Sutton to go along with me."

"I shall be glad," quoth her husband. "Prepare yourself when you will."

When she had obtained this license, she sent her man Weasel to Salisbury, to know of Goodwife Sutton if she would keep her company to London. Sutton's wife, being as willing to go as she was to request, never rested till she had gotten leave of her husband; the which when she had obtained, casting in her mind their pleasure would be small being but they twain, thereupon the wily woman sent letters by choleric Crab (her man) both to Gray's wife and Fitzalan's wife that they would meet them at Reading; who liking well of the match consented, and did so provide that they met according to promise at Reading, and from thence with Cole's wife they went altogether, with they for piercing or blinding [boring] their eyes, so long as they may go groping up and down the country like worthless persons or rogues [false lazar loons], begging and blustering [craking]." While beggars did not actually physically blind themselves, pretending to be blind, mute, deaf, or afflicted with some serious disease was a popular ploy for gaining sympathy and alms. See Thomas Harman's A Caveat for Common Cursitors (1566) in Rogues, Vagabonds and Sturdy Beggars, ed. A.F. Kinney (Amherst, MA, 1990), pp. 109-53.

---

[1] "And (as one author hath written) he [Henry I] ordained that thieves should suffer death by hanging" (Chronicles, 2.77).

[2] gadder one who wanders about idly or in search of pleasure, amusement.

each of them a man, to London, each one taking up their lodging with a several[1] friend.

When the merchants of London understood they were in town, they invited them everyday home to their own houses, where they had delicate good cheer.[2] And when they went abroad to see the commodities of the city, the merchants' wives ever bore them company, being attired most dainty and fine, which when the clothiers' wives did see, it grieved their hearts they had not the like.

Now when they were brought into Cheapside,[3] there with great wonder they beheld the shops of the goldsmiths, and on the other side, the wealthy mercers, whose shops shined of all sorts of coloured silks.[4] In Watling street, they viewed the great number of drapers;[5] in Saint Martin's,[6] shoemakers; at Saint Nicholas Church, the flesh shambles;[7] at the end of the Old Change, the fishmongers;[8] in Candlewick street, the weavers;[9] then came into the Jews' street, where all the Jews did inhabit;[10] then went they to Blackwell Hall,[11] where the country clothiers did use to meet.

Afterward they proceeded, and came to St Paul's Church, whose steeple was so high that it seemed to pierce the clouds, on the top whereof was a great and mighty weathercock of clean silver, the which notwithstanding seemed as small as a sparrow to men's eyes, it stood so exceeding high, the which goodly weathercock was afterwards stolen away by a cunning cripple, who found means one night to climb up to the top of the steeple, and took it down; with the which, and a great sum of money which he had got together by begging in his lifetime, he builded a gate on the north-west side of the city, which to this day is called Cripplegate.[12]

From thence they went to the Tower of London, which was builded by Julius Caesar, who was emperor of Rome. And there they beheld salt and wine which had lain there ever since the Romans invaded this land, which was many years before our Saviour Christ was born. The wine was

---

[1] several separate.

[2] delicate dainty, pleasing to the palate; good cheer excellent food and drink.

[3] Cheapside London's Old Marketplace, extending from the NE corner of St Paul's churchyard to the Poultry (Topographical Dict., p. 111).

[4] According to Stow, Goldsmiths' Row in Cheapside contained "the most beautiful frame of fair houses and shops that be within the walls of London" (Survey London, 1.345). Although mercers and haberdashers used to have their shops in Westcheap, by the time Stow was writing they had begun their move to London Bridge (1.81).

[5] "At this present, the inhabitants [of Watling street] are wealthy drapers, retailers of woollen cloths both broad and narrow, of all sorts more than in any one street of this city" (Survey London, 1.346).

[6] Saint Martin's St Martin's-Le-Grand, an area in London named after its church, pulled down during the reign of Henry VIII. St Martin's Lane was home to shoemakers and other tradesmen (Topographical Dict., pp. 334-35).

[7] at Saint Nicholas Church, the flesh shambles The church was located on the N side of Newgate street, and was sometimes called St Nicholas Shambles, after the "flesh shambles" (meat market) located nearby (Topographical Dict., p. 366).

[8] at the end of the Old Change, the fishmongers The Old Exchange or King's Exchange was located at the W end of Cheapside, "near unto the Cathedral church of Saint Paul" (Survey London, 1.81), and "was established for the receipt of bullion, the changing of foreign coin, and the distribution of new coinage." It was so-called in order to distinguish it from the New Exchange or Royal Exchange, established in 1567 in Cornhill, London (Topographical Dict., p. 185).

[9] Stow notes that in "old times weavers of woollen cloths, brought in by Edward the third" from Flanders and Brabant, dwelt in this street. However, "these weavers of Candlewright [Candlewick] street being in short time worn out, their place is now possessed by rich drapers, sellers of woollen cloth, etc." (Survey London, 1.218).

[10] the Jews' street, where all the Jews did inhabit Stow notes that in Aldgate ward, "of old time there were certain tenements called the poor Jewry, of Jews dwelling there" (Survey London, 1.149). More specifically, the reference is probably to Old Jewry St., "a street so called of Jews sometime dwelling there and near adjoining" (1.278). For a brief history of the persecution of the Jews in London and England generally, see Survey London, 1.278-82.

[11] Blackwell Hall i.e., Bakewell Hall, on the W side, near the S end of Basinghall St., a "very ancient building" which passed from the possession of the Bakewell family to that of the city during the reign of Richard II (1377-99); the city established it as "the Cloth Exchange of London" where both foreign and domestic cloth could be sold (Topographical Dict., p. 65; Survey London, 1.288). Given that Thomas of Reading takes place during the reign of Henry I (1100-35), this statement is clearly anachronistic.

[12] Cripplegate One of the original gates of the walled city of London, Cripplegate was so-called after the cripples who begged there (Survey London, 1.33). The story of the cripple who stole the weathercock from the top of St Paul's steeple is also recounted in William Baldwin's Beware the Cat (1570); see p. 242. It does not appear in Stow.

grown so thick that it might have been cut like a jelly. And in that place also they saw the money that was made of leather, which in ancient time went current amongst the people.[1]

When they had to their great contentation[2] beheld all this, they repaired to their lodgings, having also a sumptuous supper ordained for them with all delight that might be. And you shall understand that when the country weavers, which came up with their dames, saw the weavers of Candlewick street, they had great desire presently to have some conference with them; and thus one began to challenge the other for workmanship:

Quoth Weasel, "I'll work with any of you all for a crown—take it if you dare—and he that makes his yard of cloth soonest shall have it."

"You shall be wrought withal," said the other, "and if it were for ten crowns! But we will make this bargain: that each of us shall wind their own quills."[3]

"Content," quoth Weasel. And so to work they went, but Weasel lost.

Whereupon another of them took the matter in hand, who lost likewise, so that the London weavers triumphed against the country, casting forth divers frumps.[4]

"Alas, poor fellows," quoth they, "your hearts are good, but your hands are ill."

"Tush, the fault was in their legs,"[5] quoth another. "Pray you, friend, were you not born at home?"

"Why do you ask?" quoth Weasel.

"Because," said he, "the biggest place of your leg is next to your shoe."[6]

Crab, hearing this, being choleric of nature, chafed like a man of law at the bar,[7] and he wagers with them four crowns to twain. The others agreed; to work they go. But Crab conquered them all. Whereupon, the London weavers were nipped in the head[8] like birds, and had not a word to say.

"Now," sayeth Crab, "as we have lost nothing, so you have won nothing; and because I know you cannot be right weavers except you be good fellows, therefore if you will go with us, we will bestow the ale upon you."

"That is spoken like a good fellow and like a weaver," quoth the other.

So along they went, as it were, to the sign of the Red Cross.

When they were set down and had drunk well, they began merrily to prattle, and to extol Crab to the skies. Whereupon Crab protested that he would come and dwell among them.

"Nay, that must not be," said a London weaver. "The King hath given us privilege that none shall live among us but such as serve seven years in London."

With that, Crab, according to his old manner of prophesying, said thus:

The day is very near at hand,
Whenas[9] a king of this fair land
Shall privilege you more than so:
Then weavers shall in scarlet go,[10]

And to one brotherhood be brought;
The first is in London wrought,

---

[1] That Julius Caesar was responsible for the construction of the Tower of London was a much-debated claim in the period. Stow expresses some scepticism (1.44), while many contemporary historians (such as Polydore Vergil and Raphael Holinshed) flatly reject the notion. However, it remained a popular one in the works of "poets [Shakespeare mentions the tradition twice, once in RII and once in RIII], antiquaries and the popularizers of history" (H. Nearing, Jr., "Julius Caesar and the Tower of London," MLN 63.4 [April 1948]: pp. 228-29). Although it is possible that the leather coins and solidified wine were early archaeological finds, Stow makes no reference to these objects in his discussion of the Tower.

[2] contentation contentment, satisfaction.

[3] wind their own quills usually wound by boys or women.

[4] divers frumps various mocking speeches or jeers.

[5] Looms were operated by means of treadles, levers worked with the foot.

[6] This exchange is very obscure.

[7] Cf. Tilley A279: "chafe like an apothecary."

[8] nipped in the head reduced to a state of helplessness. Proverb: Reuter, no. 172.

[9] Whenas when.

[10] shall in scarlet go i.e., shall be dressed in scarlet, a fine worsted cloth (sometimes, but not always red) reserved for those of higher rank than mere clothiers; a reference, perhaps, to the revelation later that Fitzalan's son, Henry, will be the first lord mayor of London.

When other tradesmen by your fame,
Shall covet all to do the same.

Then shall you all live wondrous well,
But this one thing I shall you tell:
The day will come before the doom,[1]
In Candlewick street shall stand no loom,

Nor any weaver dwelling there,[2]
But men that shall more credit bear.
For clothing shall be sore decayed,
And men undone that use that trade.

And yet the day some men shall see,
This trade again shall raised be.
Whenas bailiff of Sarum town[3]
Shall buy and purchase Bishops' Down.[4]

When there never man did sow,
Great store of goodly corn shall grow;
And woad,[5] that makes all colours sound,
Shall spring upon that barren ground.

At that same day I tell you plain,
Who so alive doth then remain
A proper maiden there shall see,
Within the town of Salisbury.

Of favour sweet, of nature kind,
With goodly eyes and yet stark blind,
This poor blind maiden I do say
In age shall go in rich array.

And he that takes her to his wife
Shall lead a joyful happy life,
The wealthiest clothier shall he be,
That ever was in that country.

But clothing kept as it hath been,
In London never shall be seen:
For weavers then the most shall win
That work for clothing next the skin,

Till pride the commonwealth doth peel,
And causeth huswives leave their wheel.[6]
Then poverty upon each side,
Unto those workmen shall betide.[7]

At that time, from an Eagle's nest,
That proudly builded in the West,
A sort shall come with cunning hand,
To bring strange weaving in this land,

And by their gains that great will fall;
They shall maintain the Weavers' Hall.
But long they shall not flourish so,
But folly will them overthrow.

And men shall count it mickle[8] shame,
To bear that kind of weaver's name,
And this as sure shall come to pass,
As here is ale within this glass.

When the silly souls that sat about him heard him speak in this sort, they admired and honoured Crab for the same.

"Why, my masters!" said Weasel. "Do you wonder at these words? He will tell you twenty of these tales, for which cause we call him our canvas prophet."[9]

"His attire fits his title," said they, "and we never heard the like in our lives, and if this should be true, it would be strange."

"Doubt not but it will be true," quoth Weasel, "for I'll tell you what: he did but once see our Nick kiss Nell, and presently he poured out this rhyme:

---

1 the doom the day of the Last Judgement (at the end of the world).

2 See p. 1248, note 9.

3 Sarum town now Salisbury in Wiltshire; the original site of the city was at Old Sarum, 1½ miles N of the present city (Topographical Dict., p. 446).

4 Bishops' Down was E of Old Sarum.

5 Woad is a herb used in the dying process as a method of colour-fasting cloth (Pliny, Natural History, 2.484).

6 wheel spinning wheel.

7 betide befall.

8 mickle great.

9 canvas prophet Since canvas was a strong or coarse unbleached cloth used for various useful purposes (sails, tents, and clothes, for example), Crab is being claimed as a homely or lowly, but still useful and dependable, prophet.

That kiss, O Nell, God give thee joy,
Will nine months hence breed thee a boy.

And I'll tell you what, you shall hear: we kept reckoning, and it fell out as just as Jones' buttocks on a close stool,[1] for which cause our maids durst never kiss a man in his sight."

Upon this they broke company, and went everyone about his business: the London weavers to their frames, and the country fellows to their dames; who, after their great banqueting and merriment, went every one home to their own houses, though with less money than they brought out, yet with more pride; especially Simon's wife of Southampton, who told the rest of her gossips that she saw no reason but that their husbands should maintain them as well as the merchants did their wives:

"For I tell you what," quoth she, "we are as proper women (in my conceit) as the proudest of them all: as handsome of body, as fair of face, our legs as well made, and our feet as fine. Then what reason is there (seeing our husbands are of as good wealth) but we should be as well maintained?"

"You say true, gossip," said Sutton's wife. "Trust me, it made me blush to see them brave it out so gallantly, and we to go so homely."

"But before God," said the other, "I will have my husband to buy me a London gown, or in faith he shall have little quiet."

"So shall mine," said another.

"And mine too," quoth the third.

And all of them sung the same note,[2] so that when they came home, their husbands had no little to do,[3] especially Simon, whose wife daily lay at him for London apparel, to whom he said:

"Good woman, be content! Let us go according to our place and ability. What will the bailiffs think if I should prank thee up like a peacock, and thou in thy attire surpass their wives? They would either think I were mad, or else that I had more money than I could well use. Consider, I pray thee, good wife, that such as are in their youth masters do prove in their age stark beggars.[4]

"Beside that, it is enough to raise me up in the King's books,[5] for many times men's coffers are judged by their garments. Why, we are country folks, and must keep ourselves in good compass. Gray russet and good homespun cloth doth best become us. I tell thee, wife, it were as indecent for us to go like Londoners, as it is for Londoners to go like courtiers."

"What a coil keep you?"[6] quoth she. "Are not we God's creatures as well as Londoners? And the King's subjects as well as they? Then finding our wealth to be as good as theirs, why should we not go as gay as Londoners? No, husband, no, here is the fault: we are kept without it only because our husbands are not so kind as Londoners! Why, man, a cobbler there keeps his wife better than the best clothier in this country! Nay, I will affirm it that the London oyster-wives and the very kitchen-stuff criers[7] do exceed us in their Sunday's attire. Nay, more than that, I did see the water-bearer's wife, which belongs to one of our merchants, come in with a tankard of water on her shoulder and yet half a dozen gold rings on her fingers!"

"You may then think, wife," quoth he, "she got them not with idleness. But, wife, you must consider what London is: the chief and capital city of all the land, a place on the which all strangers cast their eyes. It is, wife, the King's chamber and his Majesty's royal seat. To that city repairs of all nations under heaven. Therefore, it is most mete and convenient that the citizens of such a city

---

1 it fell out it happened; just as Jones' buttocks on a close stool A close stool is an early type of chamber pot, enclosed in a stool or box. The origin of the simile is obscure.

2 Proverb, "to sing the same song" (Tilley S638).

3 to do trouble, commotion.

4 Proverb, "Early master long knave [i.e., servant]," meaning "when a Youth is too soon his own Master, he will squander his Patrimony, and so must turn servant" (Tilley M712). See also S740: "Who spends before he thrives, will beg before he thinks."

5 the King's books i.e., the taxation lists.

6 Proverb, "to keep a foul coil" (Tilley C505); coil fuss.

7 oyster-wives women who sell oysters and other shellfish; kitchen-stuff criers sellers of the grease or fat which drips from roasting meat, sometimes used to make candles.

should not go in their apparel like peasants, but for the credit of our country wear such seemly habits as do carry gravity and comeliness in the eyes of all beholders."

"But if we of the country went so," quoth she, "were it not as great credit for the land as the other?"

"Woman," quoth her husband, "it is altogether needless, and in divers respects it may not be."

"Why, then, I pray you," quoth she, "let us go dwell at London."

"A word soon spoken," said her husband, "but not so easy to be performed. Therefore, wife, I pray thee hold thy prating, for thy talk is foolish."

"Yea, yea, husband, your old, churlish conditions will never be left! You keep me here like a drudge and a droil![1] And so you may keep your money in your purse, you care not for your credit. But before I will go so like a shepherdess, I will first go naked! And I tell you plain, I scorn it greatly that you should clap a grey gown on my back, as if I had not brought you two pence. Before I was married, you swore I should have anything that I requested, but now all is forgotten."

And in saying this, she went in, and soon after she was so sick that needs she must go to bed. And when she was laid, she drove out that night with many grievous groans, sighing and sobbing, and no rest she could take, God wot.[2] And in the morning when she should rise, the good soul fell down in a swoon, which put her maidens in a great fright, who running down to their master, cried out:

"Alas, alas, our dame is dead, our dame is dead!"

The goodman hearing this ran up in all haste, and there fell to rubbing and chafing of her temples, sending for aqua vitae,[3] and saying, "Ah, my sweetheart! Speak to me, good wife! Alack, alack, call in the neighbours, you queans!"[4] quoth he.

With that she lift up her head, fetching a great groan, and presently swooned again, and much ado iwis[5] he had to keep life in her.

But when she was come to herself, "How dost thou wife?" quoth he. "What wilt thou have? For God's sake, tell me! If thou hast a mind to anything, thou shalt have it."

"Away, dissembler!" quoth she. "How can I believe thee? Thou hast said as much to me a hundred times and deceived me. It is thy churlishness that hath killed my heart. Never was woman matched to so unkind a man."

"Nay, good wife, blame me not without cause. God knoweth how dearly I love thee."

"Love me! No, no, thou didst never carry my love but on the tip of thy tongue," quoth she. "I dare swear thou desirest nothing so much as my death, and for my part I would to God thou hadst thy desire! But be content: I shall not trouble thee long." And with that, fetching a sigh, she swooned and gave a great groan.

The man seeing her in this case was wondrous woe. But so soon as they had recovered her, he said, "O my dear wife, if any bad conceit hath engendered this sickness, let me know it; or if thou knowest anything that may procure thy health, let me understand thereof, and I protest thou shalt have it, if it cost me all that ever I have."

"O husband," quoth she, "how may I credit your words, when for a paltry suit of apparel you denied me?"

"Well, wife," quoth he, "thou shalt have apparel or anything else thou wilt request, if God send thee once health."

"O husband, if I may find you so kind, I shall think myself the happiest woman in the world. Thy words have greatly comforted my heart. Methinketh, if I had it, I could drink a good draught of Rhenish wine."

Well, wine was sent for.

"Oh, Lord," said she, "that I had a piece of a chicken! I feel my stomach desirous of some meat."

---

[1] droil a lowly servant of all work, a drudge.

[2] wot knows.

[3] aqua vitae Latin, "water of life"; here, refined alcohol such as brandy or whiskey.

[4] queans bold, impudent women; hussies.

[5] iwis indeed, surely, certainly.

"Glad am I of that," said her husband; and so the woman within a few days after was very well.

But you shall understand that her husband was fain[1] to dress her London-like ere he could get her quiet; neither would it please her except the stuff were bought in Cheapside, for out of Cheapside nothing would content her, were it never so good; insomuch that if she thought a tailor of Cheapside made not her gown, she would swear it was quite spoiled.

And having thus won her husband to her will, when the rest of the clothiers' wives heard thereof, they would be suited in the like sort too; so that ever since, the wives of Southampton, Salisbury, of Gloucester, Worcester, and Reading went all as gallant and as brave as any Londoners' wives.

CHAPTER 7

How the Clothiers Sent the King Aid into France, and How He Overcame His Brother Robert, and Brought Him into England, and How the Clothiers Feasted His Majesty and His Son at Reading.

The King's Majesty being at the wars in France, against Louis the French king, and Duke Robert of Normandy, sending for divers supplies of soldiers out of England, the clothiers at their own proper cost set out a great number, and sent them over to the King; which Roger, bishop of Salisbury, who governed the realm in the King's absence, did certify the King thereof, with his letters written in their commendations.

And afterward it came to pass that God sent his Highness victory over his enemies, and having taken his brother prisoner brought him most joyfully with him into England, and appointed him to be kept in Cardiff Castle prisoner, yet with this favour: that he might hunt and hawk where he would, up and down the country,[2] and in this sort he lived a good while, of whom we will speak more at large hereafter.

The King being thus come home, after his winter's rest, he made his summer's progress[3] into the West Country[4] to take a view of all the chief towns. Whereof, the clothiers being advertised,[5] they made great preparation against[6] his coming, because he had promised to visit them all.

And when his Grace came to Reading,[7] he was entertained and received with great joy and triumph. Thomas Cole, being the chief man of regard in all the town, the King honoured his house with his princely presence, where during the King's abode, he, and his son, and nobles were highly feasted; where the King beheld the great number of people that was by that one man maintained in work, whose hearty affection and love toward his Majesty did well appear, as well by their outward countenances as their gifts presented unto him. But of Cole himself the King was so well persuaded that he committed much trust to him, and put him in great authority in the town. Furthermore, the King said that for the love which those people bore to him living, that he would lay his bones among them when he was dead.

"For I know not," said he, "where they may be better bestowed, till the blessed day of resurrection, than among these my friends which are like to be happy partakers of the same."

Whereupon his Majesty caused there to be builded a most goodly and famous abbey, in which he might show his devotion to God by increasing his service, and leave example to other his successors to do the like. Likewise, within the town he after builded a fair and goodly castle, in the which

---

[1] fain obligated, necessitated.

[2] "Duke Robert ... found no such favour [i.e., in his banishment] save only liberty to walk abroad in the King's forests, parks, and chases near the place where he was appointed to remain" (Chronicles, 2.57).

[3] progress a state journey made by a royal or noble personage.

[4] the West Country those counties in the southwest of England, esp. Devonshire, Somerset, Cornwall, Wiltshire, and Berkshire.

[5] advertised notified, informed.

[6] against in preparation for.

[7] Reading in Berkshire, 39 miles W of London.

he often kept his court, which was a place of his chief residence during his life, saying to the clothiers that seeing he found them such faithful subjects, he would be their neighbour and dwell among them.

After his Majesty's royal feasting at Reading, he proceeded in progress till he had visited the whole west countries, being wondrously delighted to see those people so diligent to apply their business; and coming to Salisbury,[1] the Bishop received his Majesty with great joy, and with triumph attended on his Grace to his palace,[2] where his Highness lodged.

There, Sutton the Clothier presented his Highness with a broadcloth of so fine a thread and exceeding good workmanship, and therewithal of so fair a colour, as his Grace gave commendation thereof, and—as it is said—he held it in such high estimation that thereof he made his Parliament robes. And the first Parliament that ever was in England was graced with the King's person in those robes, in requital whereof his Highness afterward yielded Sutton many princely favours.

And it is to be remembered that Simon of Southampton (seeing the King had overpassed the place where he dwelt) came with his wife and servants to Salisbury, and, against[3] the King going forth of that city, he caused a most pleasant arbour to be made upon the top of the hill leading to Salisbury, beset all with red and white roses, in such sort that not any part of the timber could be seen, within the which sat a maiden attired like a queen, attended on by a fair train of maidens, who at the King's approach presented him with a garland of sweet flowers, yielding him such honour as the ladies of Rome were wont to do to their princes after their victories; which the King took in gracious part, and for his farewell from that country they bore him company over part of the plain, with the sound of divers sweet instruments of music. All which when his Grace understood was done at the cost of a clothier, he said he was the most honoured by those men, above all the mean subjects in his land. And so his Highness passed on to Exeter, having given great rewards to these maidens.

Thomas Dove and the residue of the clothiers, against his Grace's coming thither, had ordained divers sumptuous shows: first, there was one that presented the person of Augustus Caesar, the emperor, who commanded after the Roman invasion that their city should be called Augustus, after his own name, which before time was called Isca, and of later years, Exeter.[4]

There, his Majesty was royally feasted seven days together, at the only[5] cost of clothiers, but the divers delights and sundry pastimes which they made there before the King and his nobles is too long here to be rehearsed, and therefore I will overpass them to avoid tediousness.

His Grace then coasting along the country at last came to Gloucester, an ancient city, which was builded by Glove, a British king, who named it after his own name, Gloucester.[6] Here was his Majesty entertained by Gray the Clothier, who professed himself to be of that ancient family of Grays, whose first original issued out of the ancient and honourable castle and town of Rithin.[7]

Here was the King most bountifully feasted, having in his company his brother Robert (although his prisoner the same time). And his Grace being desirous to see the maidens card and

---

[1] I.e., the King coming to Salisbury in Wiltshire, its most important town.

[2] I.e., the Bishop's palace.

[3] against in preparation for.

[4] Exeter, the county seat of Devonshire, earlier known as Isca Dumnoniorum, was a fortress for the Second Augustan Legion (from c. 55-75 CE), which perhaps gave rise to the legend of Augustus' renaming of the town after himself ("Exeter," A Dictionary of British History, ed. J. Cannon [Oxford, 2001]). This history is not in Holinshed's Chronicles.

[5] only sole.

[6] Gloucester, the county seat of Gloucestershire, "on the left bank of the Severn, 107 miles W of London. It is the ancient British Caer-Gloui, the Roman Glevum" (Topographical Dict., p. 224). Although Deloney's source has not been identified, the name of the legendary Glove clearly derives from the Latin name for the town.

[7] Rithin Ruthyn or Ruthin, Welsh for "red fort" (A Dictionary of British Place-Names, online). Roger Grey (d. 1353) was the first Baron Grey of Ruthin.

spin, they were of purpose set to their work, among whom was fair Margaret with her white hand, whose excellent beauty having pierced the eyes of the amorous Duke,[1] it made such an impression in his heart that afterward he could never forget her; and so vehemently was his affection kindled that he could take no rest, till by writing he had bewrayed[2] his mind. But of this we will speak more in another place. And the King at his departure said that to gratify them he would make his son Robert their earl, who was the first earl that ever was in Gloucester.[3]

Now when his Grace was come from thence, he went to Worcester, where William Fitzalan made preparation in all honourable sort to receive him, which man being born of great parentage was not to learn how to entertain his Majesty, being descended of that famous family whose patrimony lay about the town of Oswestry,[4] which town his predecessors had enclosed with stately walls of stone. Although adverse fortune had so grievously frowned on some of them that their children were fain[5] to become tradesmen, whose hands were to them in stead of[6] lands, notwithstanding God raised again the fame of this man, both by his great wealth and also in his posterity, whose eldest son Henry, the King's godson, became afterward the mayor of London, who was the first mayor that ever was in that city, who governed the same twenty-three years; and then his son, Roger Fitzalan, was the second mayor.[7]

The princely pleasures that in Worcester were shown the King were many and marvellous, and in no place had his Majesty received more delight than here; for the which, at his departure, he did show himself very thankful. Now when his Grace had thus taken view of all his good towns westward and in that progress had visited these clothiers, he returned to London, with great joy of his commons.

CHAPTER 8

How Hodgekins of Halifax Came to the Court, and Complained to the King, That His Privilege Was Nothing Worth, Because When They Found Any Offender They Could Not Get a Hangman to Execute Him; and How by a Friar a Gin Was Devised to Chop Off Men's Heads of Itself.[8]

After that Hodgekins had got the privilege for the town of Halifax—to hang up such thieves as stole their cloth in the night, presently[9] without any further judgement—all the clothiers of the town were exceeding glad, and persuaded themselves that now their goods would be safe all night without watching them at all, so that whereas before the town maintained certain watchmen to keep their cloth by night, they were hereupon dismissed as a thing needless to be done, supposing with themselves that seeing they should be straight hanged that were found faulty in this point, that no man would be so desperate to enterprise any such act. And indeed the matter being noised through the whole country, that they were straight to be hanged that did use such thievery, it made many lewd livers to refrain such thievery.

Nevertheless, there was at that same time living a notable thief named Wallis, whom in the north they called Mighty Wallis, in regard of his valour and manhood.[10] This man, being most subtle in

---

[1] the amorous Duke i.e., Robert, duke of Normandy, the king's brother. See p. 1243, note 7.

[2] bewrayed revealed, disclosed.

[3] "About this season the King married Robert his base [i.e., bastard] son to the Lady Maude, daughter and heir of Robert Fitzham, and withal made his said son Earl of Gloucester ..." (Chronicles, 2.63).

[4] Oswestry in Shropshire in NW England, very near the border with Wales.

[5] fain obliged, forced.

[6] in stead of in the place of.

[7] See Survey London, 2.149 and 150.

[8] See William Harrison's Description of England, where he describes this device and the kind of summary justice meted out in Halifax (Holinshed, Chronicles, 1.312).

[9] presently immediately, at once.

[10] Wallis ... manhood William Wallace (1270-1305), Scottish warrior-hero and patriot, "a young gentleman of so huge stature and notable strength of body, with such skill and knowledge in warlike enterprises, and hereto of such hardiness of stomach in attempting all manner of dangerous exploits that his match was not anywhere lightly to be found" (Chronicles, 1.209).

such kind of knavery, having heard of this late privilege and therewithal of the town's security, said that once he would venture his neck for a pack of northern cloth. And, therefore, coming to one or two of his companions, he asked if they would be partners in his adventure:

"And if," quoth he, "you will herein hazard your bodies, you shall be sharers in all our booties."[1]

At length by many persuasions, the men consented. Whereupon, late in the night, they got them all to a farrier's[2] shop, and called up the folks of the house.

"What the foule ill wald[3] you have," quoth they, "at this time of the night?"

Wallis answered, saying, "Good fellows, we would have you to remove the shoes of our horses' feet, and set them on again, and for your pains you shall be well pleased."

The smith at length was persuaded, and when he had plucked off all the shoes from their horses' feet, they would needs have them all set on again quite contrary with the calkins[4] forward, that should stand backward.

"How? Fay, fay man!" quoth the smith. "Are you sicke fules? What the deel! Do you mean to break your crags? Gud faith, I tro the men be wood."[5]

"Not so, smith," quoth they. "Do thou as we bid thee, and thou shalt have thy money, for it is an old proverb,

Be it better, or be it worse.

Please you the man that bears the purse.[6]

"Gud faith and see I sall!"[7] quoth the smith. And so did as he was willed. When Wallis had thus caused their horses to be shod, to Halifax they went, where they without any let loaded their horses with cloth, and so departed a contrary way.

In the morning, so soon as the clothiers came to the field, they found that they were robbed, whereupon one ran to another to tell these tidings. Now when Hodgekins heard thereof, rising up in haste, he willed his neighbours to mark and see if they could not descry either the footsteps of men or horses. Which being done, they perceived that horses had been there, and seeking to pursue them by their footsteps, they went a clean contrary way, by reason that the horses were shod backward. And when in vain they had long pursued them, they returned, being never the near.

Now Wallis used his feat[8] so long, that at length he was taken and two more with him; whereupon, according to the privilege of the town, they put halters about the thieves' necks presently to hang them up.

When they were come to the place appointed, Wallis and the rest, being out of all hope to escape death, prepared themselves patiently to suffer the rigor of the law. And there with the rest, laying open the lewdness of his life, grievously lamenting for his sins, at length commending their souls to God, they yielded their bodies to the grave, with which sight the people were greatly moved with pity, because they had never seen men come to hanging before. But when they should have been tied up, Hodgekins willed one of his neighbours to play the hangman's part, who would not by any means do it, although he was a very poor man, who for his pains should have been possessed of all their apparel.

When he would not yield to the office, one of those which had his cloth stolen was commanded to do the deed, but he in like manner would not, saying, "When I have the skill to make a man, I will hang a man, if it chance my workmanship do not like me."

And thus from one to another, the office of the hangman was posted off. At last a rogue came by

---

1 booty plunder, stolen goods.

2 farrier one who shoes horses.

3 foule ill wald i.e., foul ill would.

4 calkin either, the turned down ends of a horse shoe which raise the horse's heels from the ground, or, a turned edge under the front of the shoe.

5 Translation: "Fie, fie [an exclamation expressing indignant reproach], man!" said the smith. "Are you weak-headed fools? What the devil! Do you mean to break your necks? Good, faith, I believe the men be mad!"

6 Proverb, "Be it better, be it worse, do after him that bears the purse" (Tilley P646).

7 sall shall.

8 feat clever trick.

whom they would have compelled to have done that deed.

"Nay, my masters," quoth he, "not so. But as you have got a privilege for the town, so you were best to procure a commission to make a hangman, or else you are like to be without for me."

"Neighbour Hodgekins," quoth one, "I pray you do this office yourself. You have had most loss, and therefore you should be the most readiest to hang them yourself."

"No, not I," quoth Hodgekins, "though my loss were ten times greater than it is! Notwithstanding, look which of these thieves will take upon him to hang the other shall have his life saved; otherwise they shall all to prison till I can provide a hangman."

When Wallis saw the matter brought to this pass, he began stoutly to reply, saying, "My masters of the town of Halifax, though your privilege stretch to hang men up presently that are found stealing your goods, yet it gives you no warrant to imprison them till you provide them a hangman. Myself with these my fellows have here yielded ourselves to satisfy the law, and if it be not performed, the fault is yours and not ours, and therefore we humbly take our leave from the gallows, the 18th of August." And with that he leapt from the ladder, and cast the halter at Hodgekins' face.

When the clothiers saw this, they knew not what to say, but taking them by the sleeves, entreated to have their own again.

"Not so," quod Wallis. "You get not the value of a plack or a bawbee.[1] We have stolen your cloth; then why do you not hang us? Here we have made ourselves ready, and if you will not hang us, choose.[2] A plague on you! (quoth he). You have hindered me God knows what! I made account to dine this day in Heaven, and you keep me here on earth where there is not a quarter of that good cheer. The foul evil take you all! I was fully provided to give the gallows a box on the ear,[3] and now God knows when I shall be in so good a mind again!" And so he with the rest of his companions departed.

When Hodgekins saw, that notwithstanding their thievery, how they flouted at their lenity, he was much moved in mind. And as he stood in his dumps, chewing his cud,[4] making his dinner with a dish of melancholy, a Grey friar[5] reverently saluted him in this sort: "All hail, Goodman Hodgekins! Happiness and health be ever with you; and to all suppressors of lewd livers, God send everlasting joys!

"I am sorry, Goodman Hodgekins, that the great privilege which our King gave to this town comes to no greater purpose; better far had it been that it had never been granted, than so lightly regarded. The town hath suffered through their own peevishness an everlasting reproach this day, only because foolish pity hath hindered justice.

"Consider, that compassion is not to be had upon thieves and robbers; pity only appertaineth to the virtuous sort,[6] who are overwhelmed with the waves of misery and mischance. What great cause of boldness have you given to bad livers by letting these fellows thus to escape, and how shall you now keep your goods in safety, seeing you fulfill not the law which should be your defence? Never think that thieves will make any conscience to carry away your goods, when they find themselves in no danger of death, who have more cause to praise your pity, than to commend your wisdom. Wherefore, in time seek to prevent the ensuing evil."

"For my own part, I have that care of your good that I would work all good means for your benefit, and yet not so much in respect of your profit, as for the desire I have to uphold justice, and seeing I find you and the rest so womanish

[1] A plack and a bawbee were both Scottish coins of little value, the plack worth about four and the bawbee about three pennies.

[2] choose do as you like, take your own way (here, especially as an alternative to something suggested and rejected).

[3] a box on the ear a contemptuous slap or cuff.

[4] Proverb, "to be in the dumps" (Tilley D640); "to chew the cud" (Tilley C896).

[5] Grey friar a member of the Franciscan religious order, one of those Roman Catholic orders that lived on alms.

[6] Proverb, "Pity only belongs to the virtuous" (Reuter, no. 318).

that you could not find in your hearts to hang a thief, I have devised how to make a gin[1] that shall cut off their heads without man's help, and if the King will allow thereof."

When Hodgekins heard this, he was somewhat comforted in mind, and said to the friar that if by his cunning he would perform it, he would once again make suit to the King to have his grant for the same. The friar willed him to have no doubt in him; and so when he had devised it, he got a carpenter to frame it out of hand.

Hodgekins in the meantime posted up to the court, and told his Majesty that the privilege of Halifax was not worth a pudding.[2]

"Why so?" said our King.

"Because," quoth Hodgekins, "we can get never a hangman to truss our thieves. But if it shall like your good Grace (quoth he), there is a feat[3] friar that will make us a device, which shall without the hand of man cut off the crags of all such carls,[4] if your Majesty will please to allow thereof."

The King, understanding the full effect of the matter, at length granted his petition. Whereupon, till this day, it is observed in Halifax that such as are taken stealing of their cloth have their heads chopped off with the same gin.

[...]

CHAPTER 11

How Thomas of Reading Was Murdered at His Host's House of Colebrook, Who Also Had Murdered Many before Him; How Their Wickedness Was at Length Revealed.

Thomas of Reading, having many occasions to come to London, as well about his own affairs as also the King's business, being in a great office under his Majesty, it chanced on a time that his host and hostess of Colebrook, who through covetousness had murdered many of their guests, and having every time he came thither great store of his money to lay up, appointed him to be the next fat pig that should be killed. For it is to be understood that when they plotted the murder of any man this was always their term, the man to his wife, and the woman to her husband: "Wife, there is now a fat pig to be had, if you want one."

Whereupon she would answer thus: "I pray you, put him in the hogsty[5] till tomorrow."

This was when any man came thither alone without others in his company, and they saw he had great store of money.

This man should be then laid in the chamber right over the kitchen, which was a fair chamber and better set out than any other in the house: the best bedstead therein, though it were little and low, yet was it most cunningly carved, and fair to the eye; the feet whereof were fast[6] nailed to the chamber floor, in such sort that it could not in any wise[7] fall; the bed that lay therein was fast sowed to the sides of the bedstead. Moreover, that part of the chamber whereupon this bed and bedstead stood was made in such sort that, by the pulling out of two iron pins below in the kitchen, it was to be let down and taken up by a draw bridge, or in manner of a trap door. Moreover, in the kitchen, directly under the place where this should fall, was a mighty great cauldron, wherein they used to seethe[8] their liquor when they went to brewing. Now, the men appointed for the slaughter were laid into this bed, and in the dead time of the night, when they were sound asleep, by plucking out the foresaid iron pins, down would the man fall out of his bed into the boiling cauldron, and all the clothes[9] that were upon him. Where being suddenly scalded and drowned, he was never able to cry or speak one word.

---

1 gin machine.

2 Proverb, "not worth a pudding" (Tilley P626).

3 feat clever, smart.

4 crags necks; carls base fellows, knaves.

5 hogsty i.e., pigsty.

6 fast securely.

7 wise way.

8 seethe boil.

9 clothes bed-clothes (sheets and blankets).

Then had they a little ladder ever standing ready in the kitchen, by the which they presently mounted into the said chamber, and there closely[1] took away the man's apparel, as also his money, in his mail or capcase;[2] and then, lifting up the said falling floor which hung by hinges, they made it fast as before.

The dead body would they take presently out of the caldron and throw it down the river, which ran near unto their house, whereby they escaped all danger.

Now if in the morning any of the rest of the guests that had talked with the murdered man ore eve[3] chanced to ask for him, as having occasion to ride the same way that he should have done, the goodman would answer that he took horse a good while before day, and that he himself did set him forward. The horse the goodman would also take out of the stable and convey him by a hay-barn of his that stood from his house a mile or two, whereof himself did always keep the keys full charily, and when any hay was to be brought from thence, with his own hands he would deliver it; then, before the horse should go from thence, he would dismark him—as, if he wore a long tail, he would make him curtail,[4] or else crop his ears, or cut his mane, or put out one of his eyes—and by this means he kept himself a long time unknown.

Now Thomas of Reading, as I said before, being marked and kept for a fat pig, he was laid in the same chamber of death, but by reason Gray of Gloucester chanced also to come that night, he escaped scalding.

The next time he came, he was laid there again, but before he fell asleep or was warm in his bed, one came riding through the town and cried piteously that London was all on a fire, and that it had burned down Thomas Becket's house in Westcheap[5] and a great number more in the same street:

"And yet," quoth he, "the fire is not quenched!"

Which tidings when Thomas of Reading heard, he was very sorrowful, for of the same Becket that day had he received a great piece of money, and had left in his house many of his writings, and some that appertained to the King also. Therefore, there was no nay but he would ride back again to London presently to see how the matter stood; thereupon making himself ready, departed. This cross fortune caused his host to frown:

"Nevertheless, the next time," quoth he, "will pay for all."

Notwithstanding, God so wrought that they were prevented then likewise, by reason of a great fray that happened in the house betwixt a couple that fell out at dice, insomuch as the murderers themselves were enforced to call him up, being a man in great authority, that he might set the house in quietness, out of the which, by means of this quarrel, they doubted[6] to lose many things.

Another time when he should have been laid in the same place, he fell so sick that he requested to have somebody to watch with him, whereby also they could not bring their vile purpose to pass. But hard it is to escape the ill fortunes whereunto a man is allotted.[7] For albeit that the next time that he came to London his horse stumbled and broke one of his legs as he should ride homeward, yet hired he another to hasten his own death; for there was no remedy but he should go to Colebrook that night. But by the way he was heavy asleep that he could scant keep himself in the saddle; and

---

1 closely secretly.

2 mail bag, pack, or wallet; a travelling bag; capcase travelling case or bag.

3 ore eve "o'er eve" or "over night."

4 curtail closely cropped.

5 Thomas Becket's house in Westcheap Thomas à Becket (?1120-70), archbishop of Canterbury, martyr, and saint, was certainly born in London; Stow says in Cheapward (Survey London, 1.269). However, Thomas Becket held his office under Henry II (reigned 1154-89), not Henry I (reigned 1100-35), and so Thomas of Reading can hardly have received money or lodged his sensitive political papers at Becket's house (see below, ll. 1037-38).

6 doubted feared, suspected.

7 Proverb, "It is impossible to avoid (undo) fate (destiny)" (Tilley F83).

when he came near unto the town, his nose burst out suddenly a-bleeding.[1]

Well, to his inn he came, and so heavy was his heart that he could eat no meat. His host and hostess, hearing he was so melancholy, came up to cheer him, saying, "Jesus, Master Cole, what ails you tonight? Never did we see you thus sad before. Will it please you to have a quart of burnt sack?"[2]

"With a good will," quoth he, "and would to God Thomas Dove were here: he would surely make me merry, and we should lack no music. But I am sorry for the man with all my heart that he is come so far behind hand.[3] But, alas, so much can every man say, but what good doth it him? No, no, it is not words can help a man in this case; the man had need of other relief than so. Let me see: I have but one child in the world and that is my daughter, and half that I have is hers; the other half my wife's. What then? Shall I be good to nobody but them? In conscience, my wealth is too much for a couple to possess, and what is our religion without charity? And to whom is charity more to be shown than to decayed householders?

"Good my host, lend me a pen and ink, and some paper, for I will write a letter unto the poor man straight, and something I will give him. That alms which a man bestows with his own hands he shall be sure to have delivered, and God knows how long I shall live."

With that, his hostess dissemblingly answered, saying, "Doubt not, Master Cole, you are like enough by the course of nature to live many years."

"God knows," quoth he, "I never found my heart so heavy before."

By this time, pen, ink, and paper was brought, setting himself to writing, as followeth:

In the name of God, Amen. I bequeath my soul to God and my body to the ground, my goods equally between my wife Eleanor and Isabel, my daughter. Item: I give to Thomas Dove of Exeter one hundred pounds. Nay, that is too little. I give to Thomas Dove two hundred pounds in money to be paid unto him presently upon his demand thereof by my said wife and daughter.

"Ha, how say you, my host?" quoth he. "Is not this well? I pray you read it."

His host looking thereon, said, "Why, Master Cole, what have you written here? You said you would write a letter, but methinks you have made a will. What need have you to do thus? Thanks be to God, you may live many fair years."

"'Tis true," quoth Cole, "if it please God. And I trust this writing cannot shorten my days. But let me see: have I made a will? Now, I promise you, I did verily purpose to write a letter. Notwithstanding, I have written that that God put into my mind. But look once again, my host: is it not written there that Dove shall have two hundred pounds, to be paid when he comes to demand it?"

"Yes, indeed," said his host.

"Well then, all is well," said Cole. "And it shall go as it is for me. I will not bestow the new writing thereof any more."

Then, folding it up, he sealed it, desiring that his host would send it to Exeter. He promised that he would. Notwithstanding, Cole was not satisfied, but after some pause he would needs hire one to carry it. And so sitting down sadly in his chair again, upon a sudden he burst forth a-weeping; they demanding the cause thereof, he spoke as followeth:

"No cause of these tears I know. But it comes now into my mind," said Cole, "when I set toward this my last journey to London, how my daughter took on, what a coil she kept[4] to have me stay, and I could not be rid of the little baggage[5] a long time, she did so hang about me. When her mother by violence took her away, she cried out most

[1] Nose-bleeds have a long history as omens of misfortune. In Lodge's Rosalind, Rosader's nose bleeds as he watches a lion approach a sleeping man whom he does not yet know is his brother; in The Terrors of the Night, Nashe comments, "[I]f his nose bleed, some of his kinfolks is dead."

[2] burnt sack heated wine.

[3] For the outcome of Dove's business reversals, see chapter 14, below.

[4] a coil she kept See p. 1251, note 6.

[5] baggage a term of affectionate abuse.

mainly,[1] 'O my father, my father, I shall never see him again!'"

"Alas, pretty soul," said his hostess. "This was but mere kindness in the girl, and it seemeth she is very fond of you. But, alas, why should you grieve at this? You must consider that it was but childishness."

"Aye, it is indeed," said Cole, and with that he began to nod.

Then they asked him if he would go to bed.

"No," said he. "Although I am heavy, I have no mind to go to bed at all."

With that, certain musicians of the town came to the chamber, and knowing Master Cole was there drew out their instruments and very solemnly began to play.

"This music comes very well," said Cole. And when he had listened awhile thereunto, he said, "Methinks these instruments sound like the ring of St Mary Overies' bells,[2] but the bass drowns all the rest, and in my ear it goes like a bell that rings a forenoon's knell.[3] For God's sake, let them leave off, and bear them this simple reward."

The musicians being gone, his host asked if now it would please him to go to bed: "For," quoth he, "it is well near eleven of the clock."

With that Cole, beholding his host and hostess earnestly, began to start back, saying, "What ail you to look so like pale death? Good Lord, what have you done that your hands are thus bloody?"

"What, my hands?" said his host. "Why, you may see they are neither bloody nor foul. Either your eyes do greatly dazzle, or else fancies of a troubled mind do delude you."

"Alas, my host, you may see," said he, "how weak my wits are. I never had my head so idle[4] before. Come, let me drink once more, and then I will to bed, and trouble you no longer."

With that, he made himself unready,[5] and his hostess very diligent to warm a kerchief, and put it about his head.

"Good Lord," said he, "I am not sick—I praise God—but such an alteration I find in myself as I never did before."

With that the scritch-owl cried piteously, and anon after[6] the night raven sat croaking hard by his window.[7]

"Jesu, have mercy upon me!" quoth he. "What an ill-favoured cry do yonder carrion birds make!" And therewithal he laid him down in his bed, from whence he never rose again.

His host and hostess, that all this while noted his troubled mind, began to commune betwixt themselves thereof. And the man said, he knew not what were best to be done.

"By my consent," quoth he, "the matter should pass, for I think it is not best to meddle on him."

"What, man," quoth she, "faint you now? Have you done so many and do you shrink at this?"

Then, showing him a great deal of gold which Cole had left with her, she said, "Would it not grieve a body's heart to lose this? Hang the old churl! What should he do living any longer? He hath too much, and we have too little. Tut, husband, let the thing be done, and then this is our own."

Her wicked counsel was followed, and when they had listened at his chamber door, they heard the man sound asleep.

"All is safe," quoth they; and down into the kitchen they go, their servants being all in bed, and pulling out the iron pins down fell the bed, and the man dropped out into the boiling cauldron. He being dead, they betwixt them cast his body into the river, his clothes they hid away, and made all things as it should be. But when he came to the stable to convey thence Cole's horse, the stable

---

[1] mainly loudly, vehemently.

[2] St Mary Overies' bells St Mary Overy or Overies (so-called probably because it was situated just 'over' the river from London) was an ancient church in Southwark, just over London Bridge (Topographical Dict., p. 335).

[3] Proverb, "When you hear a toll or knell then think upon your passing bell" (i.e., the bell that will toll at your death) (Tilley T375).

[4] idle light-headed, incoherent, delirious.

[5] he made himself unready i.e., he undressed himself.

[6] anon after directly or immediately after.

[7] The scritch-owl or screech-owl and the raven are both birds of ill-omen and harbingers of death and grief; they figure regularly in popular accounts of murders. Cf. Tilley R33: "The croaking raven bodes death."

door being open, the horse had got loose, and with a part of the halter about his neck, and straw trussed under his belly, as the ostlers[1] had dressed him over eve, he was gone out at the back side, which led into a great field adjoining to the house, and so leaping divers hedges, being a lusty, stout horse, had got into a ground where a mare was grazing, with whom he kept such a coil that they got into the highway, where one of the town meeting them knew the mare, and brought her and the horse to the man that owned her.

In the mean space, the musicians had been at the inn, and in requital of their evening's gift, they intended to give Cole some music in the morning. The goodman told them he took horse before day. Likewise, there was a guest in the house that would have borne him company to Reading, unto whom the host also answered that he himself set him upon horseback, and that he went long ago. Anon, came the man that owned the mare, inquiring up and down to know and if none of them missed a horse, who said, "No." At last he came to the sign of the Crane where Cole lay, and calling the ostlers he demanded of them if they lacked none, they said, "No."

"Why then," said the man, "I perceive my mare is good for something: for if I send her to field single, she will come home double." Thus it passed on all that day and the night following.

But the next day after, Cole's wife, musing that her husband came not home, sent one of her men on horseback to see if he could meet him:

"And if," quoth she, "you meet him not betwixt this and Colebrook, ask for him at the Crane, but if you find him not there, then ride to London; for I doubt[2] he is either sick, or else some mischance hath fallen unto him."

The fellow did so, and asking for him at Colebrook, they answered, he went homeward from thence such a day. The servant, musing what should be become of his master, and making much inquiry in the town for him, at length one told him of a horse that was found on the highway, and no man knew whence he came. He going to see the horse knew him presently, and to the Crane he goes with him. The host of the house perceiving this was blank,[3] and that night fled secretly away. The fellow going unto the justice desired his help. Presently, after word was brought that Jarman of the Crane was gone, then all men said, he had sure made Cole away,[4] and the musicians told what Jarman said to them, when they would have given Cole music. Then the woman, being apprehended and examined, confessed the truth. Jarman soon after was taken in Windsor Forest.[5] He and his wife were both hanged, after they had laid open all these things before expressed. Also, he confessed that he, being a carpenter, made that false falling floor, and how his wife devised it, and how they had murdered by that means sixty persons. And yet notwithstanding all the money they had gotten thereby, they prospered not, but at their death were found very far in debt.

When the King heard of this murder, he was for the space of seven days so sorrowful and heavy as he would not hear any suit, giving also commandment that the house should quite be consumed with fire wherein Cole was murdered, and that no man should ever build upon that cursed ground.

Cole's substance at his death was exceeding great. He had daily in his house a hundred men servants and forty maids; he maintained beside above two or three hundred people, spinners and carders, and a great many other householders. His wife after never married, and at her death she bestowed a mighty sum of money toward the maintaining of the new-builded monastery. Her daughter was most richly married to a gentleman of great worship, by whom she had many children. And some say that the river wherein Cole was cast did ever since carry the name of Cole, being called the river of Cole, and the town of Colebrook.

---

[1] ostler stableman, groom.

[2] doubt suspect, fear.

[3] blank utterly disconcerted, discomfited.

[4] made Cole away i.e., killed him.

[5] Windsor Forest near the town in Berkshire, on the S bank of the Thames, 21 miles SW of London (Topographical Dict., p. 567).

CHAPTER 13

How Duke Robert Deceived His Keepers and Got from Them: How He Met Fair Margaret, and in Carrying Her away Was Taken, for the Which He Had His Eyes Put Out.[1]

[...]

But when the King understood of his brother's escape, he was marvellous wroth,[2] giving great charge and commandment, when he was taken that both his eyes should be put out and he kept in prison till his dying day; appointing also that the maid should lose her life for presumption in loving him.[3]

This matter being rumoured over all England, it came to the ears of Gray and his wife, who hearing that Margaret also was there in prison appointed to die, the good aged woman never rested till she came to the Court, where kneeling before the King with many tears she besought his Majesty to spare the maiden's life, saying, "Most royal King, consider, I humbly beseech you, that the Duke your brother was able to entice any woman to his love, much more a silly[4] maiden, especially promising her marriage, to make her a lady, a duchess, or a queen. Who would refuse such an offer, when at the instant they might get both a princely husband and a high dignity? If death be a lover's guerdon,[5] then what is due to hatred? I am in my heart persuaded that had my poor Margaret thought it would have bred your Highness' displeasure, she would never have bought his love so dear. Had your Grace made it known to your commons that it was unlawful for any to marry the Duke your brother, who would have attempted such an action? If she had wilfully disobeyed your Grace's commandment, she might have been thought worthy of death. But seeing ignorantly she offended, I beseech your Grace to recall the sentence, and let me still enjoy my servant, for never will I rise till your Majesty have granted my petition."

His Highness, who was of nature merciful, beholding the woman's abundant tears, took pity on her and granted her suit; which being obtained, she went home with all haste possible. And from thence, she with her husband taking their journey to Cardiff castle, they came at that very instant when the maiden was led toward her death, who went in most joyful sort to the same, saying that they were not worthy to be accounted true lovers that were not willing to die for love. And so, with a smiling countenance she passed on, as if she had eaten apium risus, which causeth a man to die laughing.[6]

But her dame Gray, seeing her, fell about her neck and with many kisses embraced her, saying, "Thou shalt not die, my wench, but go home with me; and for thy delivery, behold here the King's letters."

And with that, she delivered them up to the governor of the castle, who reading them found these words written:

---

[1] The narrative's romance plot involves a fictitious relationship between Robert and Margaret, the daughter of the banished Earl of Shrewsbury. Earlier in the story, concealing her identity, Margaret has sought and found service in the household of the clothier, Gray of Gloucester. When Gray of Gloucester feasts King Henry after Henry's victory over his brother Richard, now his prisoner, Richard lays eyes on Margaret and immediately falls in love. He woos Margaret, wins her love, and they attempt to flee together; however, they are captured and condemned to death. There are pages missing from our available 1612 edition, and so the chapter's title is taken from the 1623 edition.

[2] wroth furious, wrathful.

[3] Holinshed mentions this act three times: "But because he was perceived to practice somewhat against the King, he was eftsoons taken again, and having his eyes put out, committed to prison, where finally worn through age and grief of mind, he ended his miserable life" (Chronicles, 2.57); "Then being brought back, his keepers kept him in close prison, advertising the King of his demeanour; whereupon he commanded that the sight of his eyes should be put out, but so, as the balls of them should remain unbroken, for the avoiding of a noisome deformity that otherwise would ensue, if the glass tunicles [i.e., membranes enclosing the eye] should take hurt" (2.57). In a summary of Henry's virtues ("wisdom, eloquence and valiancy") and vices ("covetousness, cruelty and fleshy lust of body"), Holinshed offers this mutilation as an example of Henry's cruelty, and adds: "... which act was kept secret till the King's death revealed it" (2.77).

[4] silly innocent, naive.

[5] guerdon prize, reward.

[6] as if ... apium risus ... die laughing according to Gerard's Herbal (1636), "the Passe Flower or anemone."

We pardon the maid's life and grant her liberty, but let her not pass till she see her lover's eyes put out, which we will have you do in such sort that not only the sight may perish, but the eye continue fair, for which cause I have sent down Doctor Piero,[1] that he may execute the same.

The governor of the castle having read the King's letter said thus to the maiden: "The King's Majesty hath pardoned thy life and allowed thy liberty, but you must not pass before you see your lover's eyes put out."

"O sir," said the maiden, "mistake not yourself. They are my eyes that must be put out and not the Duke's; as his offence grew by my means, so I being guilty ought to receive the punishment."

"The King's commandment must be fulfilled," said the governor.

And therewithal Duke Robert was brought forth, who hearing that he must lose his eyes, said thus: "Noble mind is never conquered by grief, nor overcome by mischance,[2] but as the hart reneweth his age by eating the serpent,[3] so doth a man lengthen his life with devouring sorrow. My eyes have offended the King, and they must be punished; my heart is in as great fault: why is not that killed?"

"The King's Majesty," said the governor, "spares your life of mere love, and only is content to satisfy the law with the loss of your eyes, wherefore take in good part this punishment, and think you have deserved greater than is granted."

With this Margaret cried out, saying, "O dear love, most gentle prince! Well may you wish that I had never been born, who by seeing of me must lose your sight. But happy should I count myself, if it so please the King that I might redeem thy eyes to myself, or else that being an equal offender I might receive equal punishment. Hadst thou sustained this smart for some queen or princess of high blood, it might with the more ease be borne, but to endure it for such a one as I, it must needs cause a treble grief to be increased."

"Content thee, fair Margaret," said the Duke, "for honour ought to be given to virtue[4] and not riches: for glory, honour, nobility, and riches without virtue are but cloaks of maliciousness. And now let me take my leave of thy beauty, for never must I behold thy face. Notwithstanding, I account my eyes well lost in that I do forgo them for so peerless a paragon. Now, fair heavens, farewell! The sun, moon, and stars shall I in this world never behold again; and farewell also the fruitful earth: well may I feel thee, but those poor windows of my body[5] are now denied to view thee anymore. And though the world hath never[6] been my foe, yet will I bid it farewell too, and farewell all my friends. Whiles I live here in this world, I must suppose to sleep, and wake when I come in Heaven, where I hope to see you all again. Yet, had it pleased the King, I had rather lost my life than my eyes. Life? Why, what is it but a flower, a bubble in the water, a span long and full of misery?[7] Of such small account is life that every soldier will sell it for sixpence. And trust me, I do now detest life, worse than a goat doth hate basil."[8]

With that, the doctor prepared his instrument, and being ready to set to the Duke's eyes, he said, "Oh stay, Master Doctor, till I have conveyed my love's countenance down into my heart! Come hither, my sweet, and let me give thee my last kiss, while my eyes may direct me to thy cherry lips."

Then embracing her in his arms, he said, "Oh, that I might give thee a kiss of twenty years long, and to satisfy my greedy eyes with thy fair sight; yet it doth somewhat content me, because thou art

---

1 Doctor Piero The physician is not named in Holinshed.

2 Cf. Tilley M973: "The resolved mind has no cares."

3 Pliny notes the stag's hatred of serpents, and that it will dig them out of their holes and eat them; however, he says nothing about this action giving the stag renewed vigour (Pliny, Natural History, 2.321).

4 Proverb, "Honour is the reward of virtue" (Tilley H571).

5 Cf. Tilley E231: "The eye is the window of the mind."

6 The 1623 edition reads "ever," which, given Robert's consistent bad luck throughout the tale, makes better sense.

7 Proverb, "Life is but a span (bubble)" (Tilley L251).

8 worse than a goat doth hate basil See Pliny, Natural History, 2.54, where Pliny cites Chrysippius on the harmful effects of basil, "being hurtful to the stomach, suppressing urine, and an enemy to clear sight," all of which goats intuit "by a secret in Nature" and thus eschew it.

present at my punishment, that I may hold thee by the hand to comfort my heart at the sudden prick of my eye."

This being said, the doctor performed his duty and so put out the crystal sight. At what time, Duke Robert started up and with a most manly courage said, "I must thank his Majesty that though he depriveth me of my sight, yet he leaveth me eyes to weep for my sins."

But so soon as Margaret beheld the deed, she fell down in a swoon, and much ado her dame had to recover her life; which, when the Duke understood, he was wondrous woe, groping for her with his bleeding eyes, saying, "Oh, where is my love? For God's sake, have regard to her! And I pray you most heartily, Goodwife Gray, let her have this favour for my sake, that she may be used kindly."

And with that the keepers led him into the castle, and Margaret was carried away wondrous sick and ill; but her dame was most tender over her, and would suffer her to lack nothing. When she was somewhat well recovered, her dame Gray set her on horseback, and at her coming to Gloucester there was no small joy.

CHAPTER 14

How Thomas Dove, Being Fallen to Decay, Was Forsaken of His Friends, and Despised of His Servants; and How in the End He Was Raised Again through the Liberality of the Clothiers.

Such as seek the pleasure of this world follow a shadow wherein is no substance;[1] and as the adder aspis tickleth a man to death, so doth vain pleasure flatter us till it makes us forget God and consume our substance, as by Tom Dove it is apparent, who had through a free heart and a liberal mind wasted his wealth. And look how his goods consumed, so his friends fled from him. And albeit he had been of great ability and thereby done good unto many, yet no man regarded him in his poverty, but, casting a scornful countenance upon him, they passed by him with slender salutation. Neither would any of his old acquaintance do him good, or pleasure him the value of a farthing; his former friendship done to them was quite forgot, and he made of as much account as Job when he sat on the dunghill.[2]

Now when his wicked servants saw him in this disgrace with the world, they on the other side began to disdain him. Notwithstanding that he (to his great cost) had long time brought them up, yet did they nothing regard it, but behind his back in most scornful sort derided him, and both in their words and actions greatly abused him; reverence they would do none unto him, but when they spoke it was in such malapert[3] sort as would grieve an honest mind to hear it.

At last it came to pass that, breaking out into mere contempt, they said they would stay no longer with him, and that it was a great discredit to them to serve a person so beggarly; whereupon they thought it convenient to seek for their benefits elsewhere. When the distressed man found the matter so plain, being in great grief, he spoke thus unto them:

"Now do I find, to my sorrow, the small trust that is in this false world. Why, my masters, (quoth he) have you so much forgotten my former prosperity that you nothing regard my present necessity? In your wants, I forsook you not; in your sickness, I left you not, nor despised you in your great poverty. It is not unknown, though you do not consider it, that I took some of you up in the highway, othersome[4] from your needy parents, and brought the rest from mere beggary to a house of bounty, where from paltry boys, I brought you up to man's estate, and have, to my great cost, taught you a trade whereby you may live like men. And in requital of all my courtesy, cost

[1] Cf. Tilley L479: "Follow pleasure and it will flee."

[2] he made of as much account i.e., he is as much celebrated, respected, or appreciated as; Job when he sat on the dunghill In the Old Testament, Job, a wealthy, respected, and pious man, is reduced by God to abject poverty as a test of his faith; Job is scorned by those who previously respected him.

[3] malapert presumptuous, impudent.

[4] othersome some others.

and good will, will you now on a sudden forsake me? Is this the best recompense that you can find your hearts to yield me?

"This is far from the minds of honest servants. The fierce lion is kind to those that do him good: pluck but one thorn out of his foot, and for the same he will show manifold favours. The wild bull will not overthrow his dam, and the very dragons are dutiful to their nourishers. Be better advised, and call to mind, I beseech you, that I have not plucked a thorn out of your feet,[1] but drawn your whole bodies out of perils, and when you had no means to help yourselves, I only was your support, and he that when all other forsook you did comfort you in all your extremities."

"And what of all this?" quoth one of them. "Because you took us up poor, doth it therefore follow that we must be your slaves? We are young men, and for our parts we are no further to regard your profit than it may stand with our preferment. Why should we lose our benefit to pleasure you? If you taught us our trade, and brought us up from boys to men, you had our service for it, whereby you made no small benefit, if you had as well used it as we got it. But if you be poor, you may thank yourself, being a just scourge for your prodigality, and is my opinion plain that to stay with you is the next way to make us like you, neither able to help ourselves nor our friends. Therefore, in brief, come pay me my wages, for I will not stay; let the rest do as they will, for I am resolved."

"Well," said his master, "if needs thou wilt be gone, here is part of thy wages in hand, and the rest, as soon as God sends it, thou shalt have it."

And with that, turning to the rest, he said, "Let me yet entreat you to stay, and leave me not altogether destitute of help. By your labours must I live, and without you I know not what to do. Consider, therefore, my need, and regard my great charge. And if, for my sake, you will do nothing, take compassion on my poor children; stay my sliding foot, and let me not utterly fall through your flying from me."

"Tush," quoth they, "what do you talk to us? We can have better wages, and serve a man of credit, where our fare shall be far better and our gains greater. Therefore, the world might count us right coxcombs[2] if we should forsake our profit to pleasure you. Therefore, adieu! God send you more money, for you are like to have no more men." And thus they departed.

When they were gone, within awhile after they met one with another, saying, "What cheer? Are you all come away?"

"In faith, aye. What should we do else?" quoth they. "But hearest thou, sirrah: hast thou got thy wages?"

"Not yet," sayeth the other, "but I shall have it, and that is as good. 'Tis but ten shillings."

"Sayest thou so?" said he. "Now I see thou art one of God Almighty's idiots!"

"Why so?" said the other.

"Because," quoth he, "thou wilt be fed with shales.[3] But I'll tell thee one thing: 'twere best for thee quickly to arrest him, lest some other doing it before, there be nothing left to pay thy debt. Hold thy peace—fair words make fools fain;[4] and it is an old saying, 'One bird in hand is worth two in bush.'[5] If thou dost not arrest him presently, I will not give thee two pence for thy ten shillings."

"How shall I come by him?" quoth the other.

"Give me but two pots of ale, and I'll betray him," sayeth he.

So they being agreed, this smooth-faced Judas comes to his late master and told him that a friend of his at the door would speak with him. The unmistrusting man, thinking no evil, went to the door, where presently an officer arrested him at his man's suit.

---

[1] I have not plucked a thorn out of your feet a reference to the fable attributed to Aesop, "Androcles and the Lion." Androcles helps a wounded lion by removing a thorn from its paw; in return, when the lion and Androcles find themselves in the same Roman arena, the lion refuses to harm him. The Emperor has them both released.

[2] coxcombs fools, dolts.

[3] shales shells or husks.

[4] Proverb, "Fair words (promises) make fools fain" (i.e., glad, well-pleased) (Tilley W794).

[5] 'One … bush' Tilley B363.

The poor man seeing this, being stricken into a sudden sorrow, in the grief of his heart spoke to this effect: "Ah, thou lewd fellow! Art thou the first man that seeks to augment my misery? Have I thus long given thee bread to breed my overthrow? And nourished thee in thy need to work my destruction? Full little did I think, when thou so often didst dip thy false fingers in my dish,[1] that I gave food to my chiefest foe! But what booteth[2] complaints in these extremes? Go wife (quoth he) unto my neighbours, and see if thou canst get any of them to be my bail."

But in vain was her pains spent. Then he sent her to his kinsfolks, and they denied him; to his brother, and he would not come at him. So that there was no shift,[3] but to prison he must. But as he was going, a messenger met him with a letter from Master Cole, wherein (as you heard) he had promised him £200, which when the poor man read he greatly rejoiced, and showing the same to the officer, he was content to take his own word. Whereupon Tom Dove went presently to Reading, where, at his coming, he found all the rest of the clothiers lamenting Cole's untimely death; where the woeful widow paid him the money, by which deed all the rest of the clothiers were induced to do something for Dove. And thereupon one gave him ten pounds, another twenty, another thirty pounds, to begin the world anew. And by this means (together with the blessing of God) he grew into greater credit than ever he was before. And riches being thus come upon him, his former friends came fawning unto him, and when he had no need of them, then every one was ready to proffer him kindness. His wicked servants also that disdained him in his distress were after glad to come creeping unto him, entreating with cap and knee for his favour and friendship. And albeit he seemed to forgive their trespasses done against him, yet he would often say, he would never trust them for a straw.[4]

And thus he ever after lived in great wealth and prosperity, doing much good to the poor, and at his death left to his children great lands.

CHAPTER 15

How Fair Margaret Made Her Estate and High Birth Known to Her Master and Dame: And for the Entire Love She Bore to Duke Robert, Made a Vow Never to Marry, but Became a Nun in the Abbey at Gloucester.

After fair Margaret was come again to Gloucester, never did she behold the clear day but with a weeping eye. And so great was the sorrow which she conceived for the loss of Duke Robert, her faithful lover, that she utterly despised all the pleasures of this life, and at last bewrayed herself in this sort unto her dame:

"O my good master and dame! Too long have I dissembled my parentage from you, whom the froward destinies do pursue to deserved punishment. The woeful daughter am I of the unhappy Earl of Shrewsbury, who ever since his banishment have done nothing but drawn mischance after me; wherefore, let me entreat you (dear master and dame) to have your good wills to spend the remnant of my life in some blessed monastery."

When Gray and his wife heard this, they wondered greatly, as well at her birth as at her strange demand. Whereupon her dame knew not how to call her, whether maiden or madam, but said, "Oh, good Lord, are you a lady, and I knew it not? I am sorry that I knew it not before."

But when the folks of the house heard that Margaret was a lady, there was no small alteration, and moreover her dame said that she had thought to have had a match between her and her son, and by many persuasions did seek to withdraw her from being a nun, saying in this manner:

"What, Margaret, thou art young and fair. The world (no doubt) hath better fortune for thee, whereby thou mayest leave an honourable issue behind thee, in whom thou mayest live after death."

---

[1] Christ dips a morsel of food into a dish and gives it to Judas Iscariot, signalling that Judas will betray him (John 14:21-27).

[2] booteth avails, profits (i.e., what does it help to complain?).

[3] shift alternative.

[4] Cf. Tilley S917: "not to care (give) a straw."

These and many other reasons did they allege unto her, but all in vain, she making this reply:

"Who knoweth not that this world giveth the pleasure of an hour, but the sorrow of many days?[1] For it payeth ever that which it promiseth, which is nothing else but continual trouble and vexation of the mind. Do you think if I had the offer and choice of the mightiest princes of Christendom that I could match myself better than to my Lord Jesus? No, no, he is my husband, to whom I yield myself both body and soul, giving to him my heart, my love and most firm affection. I have overlong loved this vile world; therefore, I beseech you, farther dissuade me not."

When her friends by no means could alter her opinion, the matter was made known to his Majesty, who against the time that she should be received into the monastery came to Gloucester, with most part of his nobility, to honour her action with his princely presence.

All things being therefore prepared, the young lady was in most princely wise[2] attired in a gown of pure white satin, her kirtle of the same, embroidered with gold about the skirts; in most curious[3] sort, her head was garnished with gold, pearls, and precious stones, having her hair like threads of burnished gold hanging down behind her, in manner of a princely bride; about her ivory neck jewels of inestimable price were hung, and her hand-wrists were compassed about with bracelets of bright-shining diamonds.

The streets through the which she should pass were pleasantly decked with green oaken boughs. Then came the young lady, most like a heavenly angel, out of her master's house, at what time all the bells in Gloucester were solemnly rung, she being led betwixt the King's Majesty, having on his royal robes and imperial crown, and the chief bishop, wearing his mitre, in a cope of cloth of gold, over her head a canopy of white silk, fringed about in princely manner. Before her went a hundred priests singing, and after her all the chief ladies of the land, then all the wives and maidens of Gloucester followed, with an innumerable sort of people on every side standing to behold her. In this sort she passed on to the cathedral church, where she was brought to the nunnery gate.

The lady abbess received her, where the beautiful maiden kneeling down made her prayer in sight of all the people. Then with her own hands she undid her virgin's fair gown, and took it off, and gave it away to the poor; after that, her kirtle, then her jewels, bracelets and rings, saying, "Farewell the pride and vanity of this world." The ornaments of her head were the next she gave away, and then was she led on one side, where she was stripped, and instead of her smock of soft silk, had a smock of rough hair put upon her.

Then came one with a pair of shears, and cut off her golden-coloured locks, and with dust and ashes all bestrewed her head and face. Which being done, she was brought again into the people's sight barefoot and barelegged, to whom she said:

"Now, farewell the world; farewell the pleasures of this life; farewell my lord the King; and to the Duke's sweet love farewell. Now shall my eyes weep for my former transgressions, and no more shall my tongue talk of vanity. Farewell my good master and dame, and farewell all good people."

With which words she was taken away, and never after seen abroad. When Duke Robert heard thereof, he desired that at his death his body might be buried in Gloucester: "In that town," quoth he, "where first my clear eyes beheld the heavenly beauty of my love, and where for my sake she forsook the world;" which was performed accordingly.[4]

---

[1] Proverb, "After pleasure comes pain (sorrow)" (Tilley P408).

[2] wise manner.

[3] curious excellent; elaborate.

[4] When Duke Robert heard thereof … accordingly In contrast, Holinshed comments: "Duke Robert being also spoiled of his dominions, lands, and liberties, was shortly committed to prison within the castle of Cardiff in Wales, where he remained about the space of 26 years, and then died" (Chronicles, 2.56); and "In the 34th year of his reign, his brother Robert Curthose departed this life in the castle of Cardiff. It is said that on a festival day King Henry put on a robe of scarlet, the cape whereof being streict [i.e., strait: tight-fitting, narrow], he rent it in striving to put it over his head: and perceiving it would not serve him, he laid it aside, and said: 'Let my brother Robert have this robe,

The King also at his death requested to be buried at Reading, for the great love he bore to that place, among those clothiers, who living were his heart's comfort.[1] Gray, dying wondrous wealthy, gave land to the monastery whereinto Margaret was taken. William Fitzalan also died a most rich man, having builded many houses for the poor, whose son Henry after was the first mayor that ever was ever in London.

Sutton of Salisbury did also at his death much good, and gave a £100 to be yearly lent to poor weavers of the town to the world's end.[2] Simon of Southampton gave a most bounteous gift towards the building of a monastery at Winchester. Hodgekins of Halifax did also great good, and so did Cuthbert of Kendall, who had married twenty-three couples out of his own house, giving each of them £10 to begin the world withal.[3] Martin Byram of Manchester gave toward the building of a free-school in Manchester a great mass of money.

And thus, gentle reader, have I finished my story of these worthy men, desiring thee to take my pains in good part, which will encourage me to greater matters, perceiving this courteously accepted.

FINIS.

—1st edition, ?1598-?1600; 1st extant print edition, 1612

who hath a sharper head than I have.' Which when it was brought to Duke Robert, and the rent place not sewed up, he perceived it, and asked whether any man had worn it before. The messenger told the whole matter how it happened. Wherewith Duke Robert took such a grief for the scornful mock of his brother, that he waxed weary of his life, and said: 'Now I perceive I have lived too long, that my brother shall clothe me like his almsman with his cast and rent garments.' Thus cursing the time of his nativity, he refused from thenceforth to eat or drink, and so pined away, and was buried at Gloucester" (2.76).

[1] The King expresses this desire earlier in the fiction (p. 1253, ll. 620-25). He died in Normandy, as a result of an ague caused by consuming a lamprey against the advice of his physician, and "his body was conveyed into England, and buried at Reading within the abbey church which he had founded, and endowed in his lifetime with great and large possessions. It is written, that his body, to avoid the stench which had infected many men, was enclosed in a bull's hide, and how he that cleansed his head died of the savour which issued out of the brain. Thus we see that even princes come to the like end by as base means as other inferior persons" (Chronicles, 2.76).

[2] Stow's Survey London, 1.113 records the bequest of Thomas White, "the founder of St John's College, Oxford, [who] left money to be lent out to poor clothiers in twenty-one towns."

[3] In Elizabethan England poor, newly-engaged, or married couples would sometimes receive charity in the form of money to outfit their new household.

Thomas Campion
1567-1620

Over the course of the sixteenth century, both the variety of printed materials and the markets for them expanded dramatically. Music printing was one of these areas, although most of its growth occurred at the end of the period. Up to and including 1600, 200 items of music had been printed. Of these, the bulk were collections of psalms, in multiple editions, that could be sung to well-known tunes, along with a few editions of Continental songs, and even fewer of English. In 1575, Thomas Tallis and William Byrd—both notable composers of church music—were granted the privilege, good for 21 years, to be sole printers and sellers of music books and papers.[1] Neither they nor the printer who owned the type for printing music actually made use of the monopoly and, in 1588, Byrd passed it on to Thomas East, a printer who published two items in that year.[2] That the music was intended for performance is shown by its layout: the vocal parts are displayed in several directions on the page so that singers could read it while standing around a table with the musical score in the middle. In their search for material to supply the growing demand for songs, East and others looked to the Italian madrigal tradition, and produced collections of both Italian songs and English translations or adaptations. While this anglicized material supplied immediate demand, it impeded the development of English song by reversing the relationship between text and music. In Italian madrigals, the text was traditionally preeminent and highly poetic. However, when English words, with their very different configurations of vowels and syllables, were forced to fit the Italian tunes, the poetry became, at best, stilted, and at worst, silly.[3] By the 1590s, anthologies of English poetry provided more sophisticated texts that were paired with the native English musical traditions of carol and ayre (i.e., solo song with lute accompaniment). The two arts were mutually influential, as the verse began to reflect natural speech rhythms while composers created tunes that emphasized elements of the typically pastoral poetry.[4]

As a poet with significant musical interests, Campion's position in this pattern of development, as both practitioner and theorist, is key. Born in 1567, Campion was sent to Cambridge in 1581 and, although he left Peterhouse in 1584 without a degree, his contemporaries included figures like Abraham Fraunce, Gabriel Harvey, and Thomas Nashe, all of whom were keenly interested in the state of English letters.[5] In 1586, Campion entered Gray's Inn, a London law school that produced a disproportionate number of poets, and eight years later left to move to St. Dunstan's-in-the-West, an area of London populated by musicians. Like many of the poets of the latter half of the century, Campion's literary education was rooted in Latin. Indeed, his first collection of poems, Thomae Campioni Poemata (1595), consisted of Latin epigrams and by the end of his career a third of his published work was in Latin.[6] The epigram's tight focus on character and topic created a vivid concision in Campion's English writing that was well-suited to song. Campion's combined interests in Latin, English, poetry, and music found expression by 1597 when he contributed a dedicatory poem to John Dowland's First Book of Songs or Ayres, which was the first collection of its type.[7] By 1601, Campion's songs made up the first 21 of Philip Rosseter's Book of Ayres, a volume in which connections between words and music developed significantly.[8]

A question that dogged English poets was how to bring the quantitative meter typical of verse in Latin and Italian to bear on poetry written in English. Quantitative meter uses syllable length to determine the pattern of the line. However, English operates on the basis of stresses rather than length of syllable, with the result that experiments with

---

1 W. Maynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry and its Music (Oxford, 1986), p. 39.
2 Ibid., p. 40.
3 Ibid., p. 42.
4 Ibid., pp. 63-68.
5 Biographical details are drawn from E.B. Jorgens, "Thomas Campion," DLB 172.
6 Maynard, Elizabethan Lyric Poetry, p. 40.
7 Ibid., p. 40.
8 Ibid., p. 41.

the imposition of quantitative meter produced jolting results. Campion, steeped in both Latin and music, approached the problem from two angles. One was to use the note values in the music to produce long and short syllables in the verse he set. The other, articulated in his Observations on the Art of English Poetry (1598), was to align classical quantities with the natural stress patterns in English. Thus, long syllables find their equivalents in stressed syllables and short in unstressed syllables. For example, iambic pentameter, consisting in Latin of a short syllable followed by a long one, becomes an unstressed syllable followed by a stressed one. This solution proved to be the more functional. Another issue raised by Campion was the place of rhyme in English verse and his contention that rhyme was nothing more than a superficial verbal trick was rebutted by Samuel Daniel in his 1603 Defense of Rhyme.[1]

For Campion, the yoking of poetry and music brought him into contact with the court of James I, for which he provided libretti for three masques in 1607 and 1613. This activity inadvertently involved him in one of the most sensational murder trials of the early seventeenth century. Campion wrote The Squire's Masque for the 1613 marriage of Robert Carr, Viscount Rochester and later earl of Somerset, and Frances Howard, countess of Essex, who divorced her husband in favour of Carr. This event was opposed by Carr's friend, Sir Thomas Overbury, on the grounds of the Countess's reputation for immodesty and the fact that the relationship commenced well before Howard's divorce. Carr and Howard managed to have Overbury imprisoned and poisoned until he died in September of that year. The marriage took place a couple of months later. Suspicion of the plot was not raised until 1615, and an investigation followed. Campion was linked to these events through both his court connections and his other occupation as a physician, for which he entered training at the university in Caen in 1602. His friend and patient, Thomas Monson, was involved in the sale of the office of lieutenant of the Tower to a conspirator in the murder and Campion unwittingly transported money for the transaction. Campion and Monson were both acquitted at the 1617 trial because of their apparent lack of awareness of the plot, although Monson languished in prison from 1615. The stress of this period appears to have taken its toll, for Campion withdrew from the royal Court and its intrigues and died in 1620.

EDITIONS: Book of Ayres. Comp. and ed., Philip Rosseter. London: Peter Short, 1601. STC 21332; Observations in the Art of English Poesie. London: Richard Field for Andrew Wise, 1602. STC 4543.

from A Book of Ayres

III

I care not for these ladies
That must be wooed and prayed.
Give me kind Amaryllis,[2]
The wanton country maid,
Nature art disdaineth;
Her beauty is her own,
  Her when we court and kiss,
  She cries, "Forsooth[3] let go!"
  But when we come where comfort is
  She never will say no.

If I love Amaryllis,
She gives me fruit and flowers,
But if we love these ladies,
We must give golden showers,
Give them gold that sell love,
Give me the Nutbrown Lass,[4]
  Who when we court, etc.

These ladies must have pillows,
And beds by strangers wrought,
Give me a bower of willows,
Of moss and leaves unbought.

[1] Jorgens, "Thomas Campion," p. 43.

[2] Amaryllis common name for a female lover in pastoral poetry.

[3] Forsooth truly.

[4] Nutbrown Lass i.e., Amaryllis.

And fresh Amaryllis
With milk and honey fed,
  Who when we court, etc.

V

My love hath vowed he will forsake me
And I am already sped.
Far other promise he did make me
When he had my maidenhead.[1]
If such danger be in playing,
And sport must to earnest turn,
I will go no more a-Maying.[2]

Had I foreseen what is ensued,[3]
And what now with pain I prove,
Unhappy then I had eschewed[4]
This unkind event of love,
Maids foreknow their own undoing,
But fear naught[5] till all is done,
When a man alone is wooing.

Dissembling[6] wretch to gain thy pleasure,
What didst thou not vow and swear?
So didst thou rob me of the treasure,
Which so long I held so dear,
Now thou prov'st to me a stranger,
Such is the vile guise of men,
When a woman is in danger.

That heart is nearest to misfortune,
That will trust a feigned[7] tongue,
When flattering men our loves importune,[8]
They intend us deepest wrong.
If this shame of love's betraying
But this once I cleanly[9] shun,
I will go no more a-Maying.

VI

When to her lute Corinna[10] sings,
Her voice revives the leaden strings,
And doth in highest notes appear
As any challeng'd[11] echo clear,
But when she doth of mourning speak,
Ev'n with her sighs the strings do break.

And as her lute doth live and die,
Led by her passion, so must I,
For when of pleasure she doth sing,
My thoughts enjoy a sudden spring,
But if she doth of sorrow speak,
Ev'n from my heart the strings do break.

VIII

It fell on a summer's day
While sweet Bessie sleeping lay
In her bower, on her bed,
Light with curtains shadowed,
Jamy came, she him spies
Op'ning half her heavy eyes.

Jamy stole in through the door,
She lay slumb'ring as before,
Softly to her he drew near,
She heard him, yet would not hear,
Bessie vow'd not to speak,
He resolv'd that dump[12] to break.

First a soft kiss he doth take,
She lay still, and would not wake,
Then his hands learn'd to woo,
She dreamt not what he would do,
But still slept, while he smiled
To see love by sleep beguiled.

---

1 maidenhead virginity.
2 a-Maying celebration of or participation in the festivities of May-day.
3 is ensued has resulted.
4 eschewed shunned, escaped.
5 naught nothing.
6 Dissembling deceiving.
7 feigned false.
8 importune pester, solicit pressingly.
9 cleanly entirely, wholly.
10 Corinna popular name for female lover in Latin pastoral poetry.
11 challeng'd challenging.
12 dump daze, reverie.

Jamy then began to play,
Bessie as one buried lay,
Gladly still through this sleight,[1]
Deceiv'd in her own deceit,
And since this trance begun,
She sleeps ev'rie afternoon.

—1601

from Observations in the Art of English Poesy

Wherein it is demonstratively proved, and by example confirmed, that the English tongue will receive eight several[2] kinds of numbers,[3] proper to itself, which are all in this book set forth, and were never before this time by any man attempted.

To the Right Noble and Worthily Honoured, the Lord Buckhurst,[4] Lord High Treasurer of England.

In two things (Right Honourable) it is generally agreed that man excels all other creatures, in reason and speech, and in them by how much one man surpasseth another, by so much the nearer he aspires to a celestial essence.

Poesy in all kind of speaking is the chief beginner and maintainer of eloquence, not only helping the ear with acquaintance of sweet numbers, but also raising the mind to a more high and lofty conceit.[5] For this end have I studied to induce[6] a true form of versifying into our language, for the vulgar and unartificial[7] custom of rhyming hath I know deterred many excellent wits from the exercise of English poesy. The observations which I have gathered for this purpose, I humbly present to your lordship, as to the noblest judge of poesy, and the most honourable protector of all industrious learning, which if your Honour shall vouchsafe[8] to receive, who both in your public and private poems have so divinely crowned your fame, what man will dare to repine?[9] or not strive to imitate them? Wherefore with all humility I subject myself and them to your gracious favour, beseeching you in the nobleness of your mind to take in worth so simple a present, which by some work drawn from my more serious studies, I will hereafter endeavour to excuse.

Your lordship's humbly devoted
Thomas Campion

The First Chapter, Entreating[10] of Numbers in General

There is no writing too brief, that without obscurity comprehends the intent of the writer. These my late observations in English poesy I have thus briefly gathered, that they might prove the less troublesome in perusing, and the more apt to be retained in memory. And I will first generally handle the nature of numbers.[11] Number is discreta quantitas,[12] so that when we speak simply of number, we intend only the dissevered[13] quantity; but when we speak of a poem written in number, we consider not only the distinct number of the syllables, but also their value, which is contained in the length or shortness of their sound. As in music we do not say a strain of so many notes, but so many sem'briefs[14] (though sometimes there are no more notes than sem'briefs), so in a verse the numeration of the syllables is not so much to be observed, as their weight and due proportion. In joining of words to harmony there is nothing

---

1 sleight craft, trick.
2 several separate.
3 numbers metrical feet.
4 Lord Buckhurst Thomas Sackville (1536-1608) was a courtier, ambassador, lord treasurer, and accomplished poet. See Mirror for Magistrates, p. 290, note 2.
5 conceit thought, idea.
6 induce introduce, bring in.
7 unartificial not artful.
8 vouchsafe deign, grant.
9 repine complain, regard with dissatisfaction.
10 Entreating treating.
11 numbers metrical feet determined by syllable length.
12 discreta quantitas Latin, "separate value."
13 dissevered separated.
14 sem'briefs i.e, semibreves, the equivalent of the modern whole note.

more offensive to the ear than to place a long syllable with a short note, or a short syllable with a long note, though in the last the vowel often bears it out. The world is made by symmetry and proportion, and is in that respect compared to music, and music to poetry, for Terence saith, speaking of poets, artem qui tractant musicam,[1] confounding music and poesy together. What music can there be where there is no proportion observed? Learning first flourished in Greece; from thence it was derived unto the Romans, both diligent observers of the number and quantity of syllables, not in their verses only, but likewise in their prose. Learning, after the declining of the Roman Empire and the pollution of their language through the conquest of the barbarians, lay most pitifully deformed, till the time of Erasmus, Reuchlin, Sir Thomas More,[2] and other learned men of that age, who brought the Latin tongue again to light, redeeming it with much labour out of the hands of the illiterate monks and friars, as a scoffing[3] book entitled Epistolae obscurorum virorum[4] may sufficiently testify. In those lack-learning times, and in barbarized Italy, began that vulgar and easy kind of poesy which is now in use throughout most parts of Christendom, which we abusively call rhyme and meter, of rithmus and metrum, of which I will now discourse.

The Second Chapter, Declaring the Unaptness of Rhyme in Poesy.

I am not ignorant that whosoever shall, by way of reprehension,[5] examine the imperfections of rhyme must encounter with many glorious enemies, and those very expert, and ready at their weapon, that can if need be extempore[6] (as they say) rhyme a man to death. Besides there is grown a kind of prescription in the use of rhyme, to forstall the right of true numbers, as also the consent of many nations, against all which it may seem a thing almost impossible and vain to contend. All this and more cannot yet deter me from a lawful defence of perfection, or make me any whit the sooner adhere to that which is lame and unbeseeming.[7] For custom I allege[8] that ill uses are to be abolished, and that things naturally imperfect cannot be perfected by use. Old customs, if they be better, why should they not be recalled, as the yet flourishing custom of numerous poesy used among the Romans and Grecians. But the unaptness of our tongues and the difficulty of imitation disheartens us; again the facility and popularity of rhyme creates as many poets as a hot summer flies. But let me now examine the nature of that which we call rhyme. By rhyme is understood that which ends in the like sound, so that verses in such manner composed yield but a continual repetition of that rhetorical figure which we term similiter desinentia,[9] and that being but figura verbi[10] ought (as Tully[11] and all other rhetoricians have judicially observed) sparingly to be used, lest it should offend the care with tedious affectation. Such was that absurd following of the letter amongst our English so much of late affected, but now hissed out of Paul's Churchyard, which foolish figurative repetition crept also into the Latin tongue, as it is manifest in the book of P[s] called Praelia Porcorum, and another pamphlet all of F[s],[12] which I have seen imprinted, but I will leave these follies to their own

---

1 artem ... musicam Latin, "those who practice the art of music."

2 Erasmus ... More Desiderius Erasmus (c. 1466-1536), Johannes Reuchlin (1455-1522), and Thomas More (1478-1535) were leading northern European humanists, who emphasized the revival of Latin as an international language of scholarship.

3 scoffing satirical, ridiculing.

4 Epistolae obscurorum virorum "Letters of Obscure Men," a 1515 defense of Reuchlin by satirist Crotus Rubianus (c. 1480-c. 1539) and Ulrich von Hutten (1488-1523) that scorned scholasticism and monasticism.

5 reprehension refutation, rebuke.

6 extempore impromptu.

7 unbeseeming unbecoming, unbefitting.

8 allege affirm.

9 similiter desinentia Latin, "similar ending" (i.e., rhyming).

10 figura verbi Latin, "figure of words" (i.e., verbal ornament).

11 Tully Marcus Tullius Cicero (106-43 BCE) was a famous orator and rhetorician who served as a model for humanist writings in Latin.

12 book of P[s] ... pamphlet all of F[s] Pugna Porcorum per P. Porcium Poetam—"Battle of the Pigs by P. Porcius, poet"—was a burlesque in which each word begins with "p," published in 1530. The pamphlet all of "f"s is unidentified (W.R. Davis, The Works of Thomas Campion, New York, 1970, p. 294).

ruin and return to the matter intended. The ear is a rational sense, and a chief judge of proportion, but in our kind of rhyming what proportion is there kept, where there remains such a confused inequality of syllables? Iambic[1] and trochaic[2] feet which are opposed by nature, are by all rhymers confounded. Nay, oftentimes they place instead of an iambic the foot pyrrychius, consisting of two short syllables, curtailing their verse,[3] which they supply in reading with a ridiculous, and unapt, drawing of their speech. As for example:

Was it my destiny, or dismal chance?

In this verse the two last syllables of the word, "destiny," being both short, and standing for a whole foot in the verse, cause the line to fall out shorter than it ought by nature. The like impure errors have in time of rudeness been used in the Latin tongue, as the Carmina Proverbialia[4] can witness, and many other such reverend babbles. But the noble Grecians and Romans whose skillful monuments outlive barbarism, tied themselves to the strict observation of poetical numbers, so abandoning the childish titillation of rhyming, that it was imputed a great error to Ovid[5] for setting forth this one rhyming verse,

Quot coelum stellas tot habet tua Roma puellas.[6]

For the establishing of this argument, what better confirmation can be had, than that of Sir Thomas More in his book of epigrams,[7] where he makes two sundry epitaphs upon the death of a singing man at Westminster, the one in learned number and disliked, the other in rude rhyme and highly extolled, so that he concludes, tales lactucas talia labri petunt, "like lips, like lettuce."[8] But there is yet another fault in rhyme altogether intolerable, which is that it enforceth a man oftentimes to abjure[9] his matter, and extend a short conceit beyond all bounds of art, for in quatorzeens[10] methinks the poet handles his subject as tyrannically as Procrustes[11] the thief his prisoners, whom when he had taken, he used to cast upon a bed, which if they were too short to fill, he would stretch them longer; if too long, he would cut them shorter. Bring before me now any the most self-loved rhymer, and let me see if without blushing he be able to read his lame halting rhymes. Is there not a curse of nature laid upon such rude poesy, when the writer is himself ashamed of it, and the hearers in contempt call it rhyming and ballating?[12] What divine in his sermon, or grave counseller in his oration will allege the testimony of a rhyme? But the divinity of the Romans and Grecians was all written in verse and Aristotle, Galen,[13] and the books of all the excellent philosophers are full of the testimonies of the old poets. By them was laid the foundation of all human wisdom, and from them the knowledge of [1] Iambic metrical foot made up of an unaccented syllable followed by an accented syllable. In quantitative meter, this pattern is expressed by a short syllable followed by a long syllable.

[2] trochaic metrical foot made up of an accented syllable followed by an unaccented syllable. In quantitative meter, this pattern is expressed by a long syllable followed by a short syllable.

[3] pyrrychius … curtailing their verse shortening the time value of the line so that, while the line contains the correct number of syllables, its time value is thrown off by the substitution of a short syllable for a long one (Davis, p. 295).

[4] Carmina Proverbialia anthology of contemporary Latin poetry published in 1576.

[5] Ovid Roman poet, Publius Ovidius Naso (43 BCE-c. 17 CE).

[6] Quot coelum stellas tot habet tua Roma puellas Latin, "The sky has as many stars as your Rome girls."

[7] Thomas More … epigrams More's Epigrammata (1518).

[8] Proverb, "Like (such) lips like (such) lettuce" (Tilley L326), meaning that ill-natured people are usually matched with equally ill-natured ones (like a bad servant with an evil master, or a dull pupil with an ignorant teacher).

[9] abjure abandon, abnegate.

[10] quatorzeens i.e., quatorzains, fourteen-line rhymed stanzas.

[11] Procrustes Procrustes kept a house by the side of the road where he offered hospitality to passing strangers, who were invited in for a pleasant meal and a night's rest in a bed described as having the unique property that its length exactly matched whomsoever lay down upon it. This adjustment was achieved by stretching or compressing the occupant, rather than the bed itself.

[12] ballating composing ballads, which typically employ a galloping meter.

[13] Aristotle, Galen Greek writers on philosophy, science, and medicine.

all antiquity is derived. I will propound but one question, and so conclude this point: if the Italians, Frenchmen, and Spaniards, that with commendation have written in rhyme, were demanded whether they had rather the books they have published (if their tongue would bear it) should remain as they are in rhyme or be translated into the ancient numbers of the Greeks and Romans, would they not answer "into numbers"? What honour were it then for our English language to be the first that, after so many years of barbarism, could second the perfection of the industrious Greeks and Romans? Which how it may be effected I will now proceed to demonstrate.

—1602

Elizabeth Grymeston

b. in or before 1563-d. 1601/1604

Elizabeth Grymeston's collection of advice for her only surviving son is the first in a series of five mother's advice books written by women in the first quarter of the seventeenth century. Grymeston's Miscellanea. Meditations. Memoratives went through four editions in two versions. The first, published in 1604, contained fourteen chapters, with that number increasing to twenty in subsequent editions.[1] The book is of interest not just because of its seminal position in the history of women's advice-writing, but also because it gives voice to the Roman Catholic minority during Elizabeth I's reign and subtly transgresses legal limits on the articulation of recusant views.[2]

Many details of Grymeston's life are unclear. She was born in or before 1563 to Martin and Margaret Bernye, of Norfolk, and by 1584 had married Christopher Grymeston, who came from a Yorkshire family.[3] The marriage was a curious affair, insofar as Christopher Grymeston appears to have been in the midst of his education at Caius College, Cambridge, at the time and was a fellow of the college until 1592. Since, according to university statutes, fellowships could not be retained after marriage, the Grymestons must have concealed theirs until 1592 when Christopher entered Gray's Inn, one of the London law schools.[4] After this time, he appears to have been able to gain title to some of the Bernye property for his wife, albeit not without an acrimonious dispute with her mother. Of the couple's nine children, only the addressee of the volume, Bernye, survived. The date of Elizabeth Grymeston's death is as unclear as that of her birth. Critics have usually posited 1602 or 1603, as the text quotes some poems that were not in print until 1601 and Grymeston was dead by the time the first edition was published in 1604.[5]

From the evidence of her work, Grymeston appears to have had an education that included Latin, Greek, and Italian. This fairly typical humanist education is reflected in Grymeston's textual practice, for the wisdom she presents to her son is quoted or adapted from a variety of sources in all of the languages with which she was familiar. Grymeston is frank about the book's composition from textual fragments and while her prose borrowings are worked smoothly into a consistent style, the fragments of verse are easily recognizable and drawn largely from a printed poetic miscellany, England's Parnassus or Flowers of Our Modern Poets (1600).[6] Grymeston selects her sources in clusters that address the issues she wishes to raise for her son, a process aided by the organization of poetic extracts in England's Parnassus according to the categories of doctrine they represent, such as Soul, Pleasure, and Death. Advice offered to sons by fathers is part of a humanist tradition stretching from Erasmus to figures like William Cecil and Walter Ralegh. Humanist tradition provides a basis for advice books by women as well, for in both humanist and Protestant writing on the family the mother was supposed to take an active role in the academic and spiritual education of her children. Nicholas Breton set the immediate stage for advice-writing by mothers with his The Mother's Blessing (1602), in which he adopts a female voice for his speaker.[7]

While Grymeston's work, like that of the women who followed her, is ostensibly directed at her son as its sole audience, she engages, both directly and indirectly, issues of authority and recusancy. Legislation against Roman Catholics grew increasingly draconian in the latter part of Elizabeth's reign. A 1585 statute made Roman Catholics who refused to attend Church of England services liable to a fine of £20 a month, which was equal to the annual salary of an average parish schoolmaster.[8] In the event that an offender could not pay the fine, the state could confiscate all of their goods and two thirds of their land, even to the point of taking a household's only remaining cow and stripping the house of its

---

1 R. Hughey and P. Hereford, "Elizabeth Grymeston and her Miscellanea," The Library, 4th Series, 15 (1934): p. 61.

2 See M. Matchinske, "Gendering Catholic Conformity: The Politics of Equivocation in Elizabeth Grymeston's Miscelanea," Journal of English and Germanic Philology 101 (2002): pp. 329-57.

3 Hughey and Hereford, "Elizabeth Grymeston," p. 71.

4 Ibid., pp. 72-74.

5 Ibid., p. 75.

6 Ibid., pp. 83-84.

7 K. Poole, "'The Fittest Closet for all Goodness': Authorial Strategies of Jacobean Mothers' Manuals," Studies in English Literature 35 (1995): p. 70.

8 J. Carey, John Donne: Life, Mind, and Art (Oxford, 1981), p. 15.

linens, provisions, and window glass. By declaring it high treason for any Jesuit or seminary priest to be within the boundaries of the Queen's possessions, and a felony for any lay person to assist or harbour him, legislation effectively made practicing Roman Catholicism illegal. Investigations, raids, and persecution were active and prisons, in which offenders were kept under appalling conditions and subject to horrific torture, were established and filled with Catholics. As a result, it was common for the male heads of families to conform outwardly, which left Roman Catholic practice as a covert female activity and made the mother very significant in the shaping of the spiritual life of a family's children.[1]

A combination of family connections and allusions within her work provide evidence for Grymeston's Roman Catholic sympathies. The north tended to be a recusant stronghold and Christopher Grymeston's Yorkshire family had at least one branch known to be actively Roman Catholic, while he himself was at Caius College under Dr. Legge who, in 1582, was accused of encouraging "popery."[2] Robert Southwell, possibly the best-known recusant poet at the end of the century, was a kinsman of Elizabeth Grymeston and she herself appeared on the 1592-93 recusancy rolls, which indicates that her attendance at Church of England services was sparse enough to be noticed.[3] Grymeston's book opens with verses by Simon Grahame, a Franciscan priest,[4] and along with classical material from Seneca, Virgil, Terence, and Pindar, many of her prose borrowings are drawn from the Church Fathers, including thinkers like Gregory, Jerome, John Chrysostom, Ambrose, and Augustine. Consistent with this tendency is that all of her biblical quotations come from the Vulgate. Her motto, En Ma Foy Je Suffre Tout ("for my faith I suffer all"), is suggestive, in that it indicates submission while invoking the idea of martyrdom and resolute loyalty at the same time. In organizing the volume, Grymeston selects and groups her quotations in such a way as to articulate covertly a position on the questions of authority and loyalty. While her initial emphasis seems to be on questions of behaviour and self-discipline, she also concerns herself with the ephemerality of temporal power in the face of spiritual commitment, even when tyrants torture martyrs. In making these arguments, Grymeston exploits the ambiguous position offered by motherhood. On the one hand, she acknowledges her own female weakness and impotence, but on the other uses the spectre of her own death, along with her role as teacher to her children, to grant authority to her statements.

EDITION: Miscelanea. Meditations. Memoratives. London: Printed by Melchior Bradwood for Felix Norton, 1604. STC 12407.

from Miscellanea. Meditations. Memoratives

Non est rectum, quod a Deo non est directum.[5]

To Her Loving Son, Bernye Grymeston

The Epistle

My dearest son, there is nothing so strong as the force of love; there is no love so forcible as the love of an affectionate mother to her natural child: there is no mother can either more affectionately show her nature, or more naturally manifest her affection, than in advising her children out of her own experience to eschew[6] evil, and incline them to do that which is good. Out of these resolutions, finding the liberty of this age to be such as that quicquid libet licet,[7] so men keep themselves from criminal offences; and my mother's undeserved wrath so virulent as that I have neither power to resist it, nor patience to endure it, but must yield to this languishing consumption to which it hath brought me, I resolved to break the barren soil of my fruitless brain to dictate something for thy

1 Matchinske, "Gendering Catholic Conformity," p. 345.
2 Hughey and Hereford, "Elizabeth Grymeston," p. 81.
3 Matchinske, "Gendering Catholic Conformity," p. 337.
4 Ibid., p. 337.
5 Non est rectum ... non est directum Latin, "That which is not guided by God is not righteous."
6 eschew shun, avoid.
7 quicquid libet licet Latin, "Whatever is willed is law" (i.e., individuals are governed by their desires).

direction, the rather for that as I am now a dead woman among the living, so stand I doubtful of thy father's life, which, albeit[1] God hath preserved from eight several sinister assaults by which it hath been sought, yet for that I see that Quem saepe transit casus, aliquando invenit,[2] I leave thee this portable veni mecum[3] for thy counsellor, in which thou mayest see the true portraiture of thy mother's mind and find something either to resolve thee in thy doubts or comfort thee in thy distress, hoping that being my last speeches, they will be better kept in the conservance of thy memory, which I desire thou wilt make a register of heavenly meditations. For, albeit, if thou provest learned (as my trust is thou wilt, for that without learning man is but as an immortal beast) thou mayest happily think that if every philosopher fetched his sentence, these leaves would be left without lines, yet remember withal[4] that as it is the best coin that is of greatest value in fewest pieces, so is it not the worst book that hath most matter in least words.

The gravest wits, that most grave works expect,
The quality, not quantity, respect.

And the spider's web is neither the better because woven out of his own breast, nor the bee's honey the worse for that gathered out of many flowers; neither could I ever brook[5] to set down that haltingly in my broken style, which I found better expressed by a graver author.

God send thee, too, to be a wit's chameleon,
That any author's colour can put on.

I have prayed for thee that thou mightest be fortunate in two hours of thy lifetime: in the hour of thy marriage and at the hour of thy death. Marry in thine own rank and seek especially in it thy contentment and preferment.[6] Let her neither be so beautiful as that every liking eye shall level at her, nor yet so brown[7] as to bring thee to a loathed bed. Defer not thy marriage till thou comest to be saluted with a "God speed you, sir," as a man going out of the world after forty; neither yet to the time of "God keep you, sir," whilst thou art in thy best strength after thirty; but marry in the time of "You are welcome, sir," when thou art coming into the world, for seldom shalt thou see a woman out of her own love to pull a rose that is full blown, deeming them always sweetest at the first opening of the bud. It was Phaedra her confession to Hippolytus,[8] and it holds for truth with the most: Thesei vultus amo illos priores quos tulit quondam iuvenis.[9] Let thy life be formal that thy death may be fortunate, for he seldom dies well that liveth ill. To this purpose, as thou hast within thee reason as thy counsellor to persuade or dissuade thee and thy will as an absolute prince with a fiat vel evitetur, with a "let it be done or neglected," yet make thy conscience thy censor morum[10] and chief commander in thy little world. Let it call reason to account whether she have subjected herself against reason to sensual appetites. Let thy will be censured, whether her desires have been chaste or as a harlot she have lusted after her own delights. Let thy thoughts be examined. If they be good, they are of the Spirit (quench not the Spirit); if bad, forbid them entrance, for once admitted they straightways fortify and are expelled with more difficulty than not admitted.

---

1 albeit even though, although.

2 Quem saepe transit casus, aliquando invenit Latin, "Whom calamity passes over frequently, it lights upon finally" (Seneca Hercules Furens l. 325).

3 veni mecum come with me (i.e., an easy reference).

4 withal besides, in addition.

5 brook tolerate, bear.

6 preferment advancement, promotion in condition.

7 brown A swarthy complexion was considered less desirable than a fair one.

8 Phaedra ... Hippolytus Phaedra was the daughter of King Minos of Crete who fell in love with Hippolytus, the son of Theseus and Hippolyta. Even though Phaedra, who in her youth had been a lover of Theseus, was Hippolytus' mother-in-law, this did not prevent her from desiring the young man, who did not return her ardour (Dict. Gods and Mortals).

9 Thesei vultus ... quodam iuvenis Latin, "I love those former looks of Theseus, which at one time the young man offered me" (Seneca, Phaedra l.646-47).

10 censor morum judge of moral order and decency.

Crush the serpent in the head,
Break ill eggs ere they be hatched.
Kill bad chickens in the tread,
Fledge, they hardly can be catched.
In the rising, stifle ill,
Lest it grow against thy will.[1]

For evil thoughts are the devil's harbingers;[2] he never resteth, but where they provide his entertainment. These are those little ones whose brains thou must dash out against the rock of true judgement, for

As a false lover that thick snares hath laid
T'entrap the honour of a fair young maid,
When she (though little) listening ear affords
To his sweet, courting, deep-affected[3] words,
Feels some assuaging of his freezing flame,
And soothes himself with hope to gain his game,
And rapt with joy, upon this point persists:
That parleying[4] city never long resists.
Even so the serpent that doth counterfeit
A guilefull call t'allure us to his net,
Perceiving us his flattering gloze[5] digest,
He prosecutes and jocund[6] doth not rest,
Till he have tried foot, hand, and head, and all,
Upon the breach[7] of this new-battered wall.[8]

I could be content to dwell with thee in this argument, but I must confine myself to the limits of an epistle, quae non debet implere sinistram manum.[9] To which rule I do the more willingly submit myself, for that the discourses following are motives to the same effect, which I pray thee use to peruse, even in that my affectionate love, which diffused amongst nine children which God did lend me, is now united in thee, whom God hath only left for my comfort and because God hath endued[10] thee with so violent a spirit, as that quicquid vis valde vis,[11] therefore by so much the more it behoveth[12] thee to deliberate what thou undertakest. To which purpose my desire is that thou mightest be seasoned with these precepts in thy youth, that the practice of thy age may have a taste of them. And because that it is incident[13] to quick spirits to commit rash attempts, as ever the love of a mother may challenge the performance of her demand of a dutiful child, be a bridle to thyself to restrain thee from doing that which indeed thou mayest do, that thou mayest the better forebear that which in truth thou oughtest not to do. For haud cito progreditur ad maiora peccata, qui parva reformidat; he seldomest commits deadly sin that makes a conscience of a venial[14] scandal.

Thou seest my love hath carried me beyond the list I resolved on and my aching head and trembling hand have rather a will to offer than ability to afford further discourse. Wherefore[15] with as many good wishes to thee as good will can measure, I abruptly end, desiring God to bless thee with sorrow for thy sins, thankfulness for his benefits, fear of his judgements, love of his mercies, mindfulness of his presence, that living in his fear thou mayest die in his favour, rest in his peace, rise in his power, remain in his glory, for ever and ever.

Thine assured loving mother
Elizabeth Grymeston

En Ma Foy Je Suffre Tout.[16]

[1] Crush the serpent ... against thy will from "Loss in Delays" by Robert Southwell.

[2] harbingers forerunners.

[3] affected both favourably inclined and pretended.

[4] parleying discussing terms (for surrender).

[5] gloze deceit, pretense.

[6] jocund merry, joyful.

[7] breach break.

[8] As a false lover ... this new-battered wall from The Second Weeke or Childhood of the World, of the Noble, Learned and Diuine Salustius, Lord of Bartas, trans. Joshua Sylvester. London: P. Short, 1598. STC 21661.5.

[9] quae non debet ... manum Latin, "Which ought not to employ the left hand" (i.e., should be brief). See Seneca Epistulae Morales ad Lucilium [Moral Letters to Lucilius], Epistle XLV.

[10] endued granted, endowed.

[11] quicquid vis valde vis Latin, "Whatever you wish, you wish vehemently."

[12] behoveth is necessary, is incumbent upon.

[13] incident liable, natural.

[14] venial pardonable, excusable.

[15] Wherefore in consequence, on account of.

[16] En Ma Foy Je Suffre Tout French, "For my faith I suffer all."

MISCELLANEA

Tota vita dies unus.[1]

Chapter I
A Short Line How to Level Your Life.

When thou risest, let thy thoughts ascend, that grace may descend, and if thou canst not weep for thy sins, then weep because thou canst not weep.

Remember that prayer is the wing wherewith thy soul flyeth to heaven and meditation the eye wherewith we see God and repentance the supersedeas[2] that dischargeth all bond of sin.

Let thy sacrifice be an innocent heart. Offer it daily at set hours, with that devotion that well it may show, thou both knowest and acknowledgest his greatness before whom thou art. So carry thyself as worthy of his presence.

Where thou owest, pay duty; where thou findest, return courtesies; where thou art known, deserve love. Desire the best; disdain none but evil company. Grieve but be not angry at discourtesies. Redress but revenge no wrongs. Yet so remember pity, as you forget not decency.

Let your attire be such as may satisfy a curious eye, and yet bear witness of a sober mind.

Arm yourself with that modesty that may silence that untemperate[3] tongue, and control that unchaste eye, that shall aim at passion.

Be mindful of things past, careful of things present, provident of things to come. Go as you would be met. Sit as you would be found. Speak as you would be heard. And when you go to bed, read over the carriage of yourself that day. Reform that is amiss and give God thanks for that which is orderly, and so commit thyself to him that keeps thee.

Teach me, O Lord, to number my ways, and to order my life after this thy direction.

[1] Tota vita dies unus Latin, "a whole life in a single day."

[2] supersedeas Latin, a writ commanding the stay of legal proceedings which ought otherwise to have proceeded.

[3] untemperate unbridled, immoderate.

Chapter III
A Pathetical Speech of the Person of Dives[4] in the Torments of Hell.

O Death, how sudden was thy arrest unto me? How unexpected while my body was strong, while my entrails were full of fat, and my bones were watered with marrow,[5] while I had rest in my substance and peace in my riches; in one night my soul was taken from me, and all my joy was turned into mourning:

Like as the sacred ox that careless stands,
With gilded horns and flowery garlands crowned,
Proud of his dying honour and dear bands,
Whilst theatres fume with frankincense around,
All suddenly with mortal blow astound
Doth grovelling fall and with his steaming gore
Distain[6] the pillars and the holy ground,
And the fair flowers that decked him afore,
So down I fell on wordless precious shore.[7]

I saw my friends forsake me in a moment. I felt how hard a thing it was to sever two such old acquaintances as my soul and body. I wanted no view of the vanities wherein I had delighted. On the one side hung a register of my sins committed; on the other side lay a catalogue of good deeds omitted. Within me boiled my conscience confessing and accusing me; before me stood the judgements of God denounced against sin so mustered[8] in rank, as I might well perceive my dangers were certain, and destruction imminent. In this ecstasy, while I desired but one hour's delay, I was carried with a motion torrenti simili, as swift as the torrent before the tribunal seat of God:

[4] Dives In Luke 16:19-31, a beggar named Lazarus dies and goes to Abraham's bosom (i.e., Heaven), while an unnamed wealthy man ("dives" is Latin for "riches") is consigned to Hell.

[5] O Death … marrow paraphrase of Job 21:23-24.

[6] Distain stain, discolour.

[7] Like as the sacred ox … shore slightly adapted from Spenser's Faerie Queene III.iv.17.

[8] mustered collected, assembled.

Under whose feet, subjected to his grace,
Sat Nature, Fortune, Motion, Time and Place.[1]

To this tribunal seat attended me my evil works, where Christ showing himself had laid open unto me the benefits he had bestowed upon me, the rewards he promised me, the torments he suffered for me, all which, the Devil confessing, concluded me to be his. For that though he never loved me, yet I served him; though he never gratified me, yet I obeyed him; without wooing he won me, performing what he suggested, embracing what he preferred, affecting everything he cast in my way, all which my conscience acknowledging, censured me to this bottomless depth, to this profound lake, to this sink[2] of the world, whither all the afflictions and unpleasant things in the world drain and unite themselves to take revenge of sin:

A deadly gulf, where nought but rubbish grows,
Which up in th' air such stinking vapour throws
That over there may fly no bird but dies,
Choked with the pestilent savours that arise.[3]

To this chaos of confusion, to this well of perdition wherein I am coarcted,[4] to this burning lake of fire and brimstone, wherein I lie burning but not consuming, lamenting but not pitied; where I vomit out the riches which I devoured, in pain without ease, in torture without intermission; where my lascivious eyes are afflicted with most ugly and fearful sights of grisly[5] devils. My ears that once were delicate, are laden now with the hideous noise of damned spirits; my nose that once was dainty is cloyed with the stink of unsupportable filth; my taste that sometimes was curious and forfeited with plenty is now tormented with want; my imagination is vexed with apprehension of pains present; my memory grieved with the loss of pleasures past; my understanding affected with the consideration of felicity[6] lost and misery found. Thus comparing senses' pleasure with incumbent[7] joys, I find my joys abortive, perished ere they bud, my pains everlasting, during[8] beyond eternity.

Your fond preferments are but children's toys,
And as a shadow all your pleasures pass.
As years increase, so waning are your joys:
Your bless[9] is brittle, like a broken glass,
Or as a tale of that which never was.[10]

Wherefore as one past cure, dejected beyond hope of redemption into endless perdition, rather condoling my misfortune, than expostulating my mishap whereof myself was author, I call to you, the glory of your age, the meat of time, who proud in your errors tread the path of worldly pleasures wherein I was impathed:[11] Frustra, O frustra haec alio properanti.

What in this life we have or can desire,
Hath time of growth and moment of retire.
So feeble is man's state as sure it will not stand,
Till it disordered be from earthly band.[12]

It was a condition annexed to our creation: Intrasti ut exires, thou wert born to die. Nothing more sure than thy dissolution, no time more uncertain than thy time of separation. Be always ready to prevent that enemy that is always in readiness to take advantage: Qui non vult in vita praevidere mortem, non potest in morte videre vitam: "Who while he lives will not prevent eternal death, shall never after death inherit eternal life."

---

[1] Under … Place quoted from Tasso, Gerusalemme Liberata, trans. Edward Fairfax (1600), and found in England's Parnassus, p. 115.

[2] sink cesspool.

[3] A deadly gulf … arise quotation from Thomas Sackville's "Induction" to A Mirror for Magistrates (1563), found in England's Parnassus, p. 133. For "The Induction," see pp. 291-98.

[4] coarcted restricted, confined.

[5] grisly horrible, terrifying.

[6] felicity happiness.

[7] incumbent approaching.

[8] during enduring, lasting.

[9] bless i.e., bliss.

[10] Your fond preferments … which never was attributed to Michael Drayton in England's Parnassus (p. 230).

[11] impathed put into to pursue a course (neologism not in OED).

[12] What in this life … from earthly band conflation of lines by Thomas Lodge and Edmund Spenser (The Faerie Queene II.xi.30), found in England's Parnassus, pp. 168-69.

Let every one do all the good he can:
For never cometh ill of doing well.
Though just reward it wants here now and then,
Yet shame and evil death it doth expel ...
Wretched is he that thinks by doing ill,
His evil deeds long to conceal and hide:
For though the voice and tongues of men be still,
By fowls and beasts his sin shall be descried.
And God oft worketh by his secret will,
That sin itself the sinner so doth guide,
That of his own accord without request,
He makes his wicked doings manifest.
Shame follows sin never so closely done;
Shame always ends what wickedness begun.[1]

Hoc est momentum temporis unde pendet aeternitas: "The carriage of thyself in this life is the beam whereof[2] thy welfare forever dependeth."[3] Defer not thy amendment:

Good is best when soonest wrought,
Lingering thoughts do come to nought.
O suffer not delay to steal the treasure of that day,
Whose smallest minute lost, no riches render may.[4]

Turpe est eo statu vivere in quo non statuas mori: "In vain thou livest in that estate of life, in which thou meanest not to die." Make, oh make, your salvation sure unto you by good works. Incline your heart to do good, for the reward thereof is infinite, for he is coming and cometh quickly, and brings his reward with him to distribute to every one as he hath deserved even according to his works. Omission and commission brought my confusion.

Cautior exemplo tu: "let my example provoke you" to detest that wherein I took delight, lest you also to come hither to be tormented not only with oppression of eternal punishment, but with omission of everlasting joys, which I admire now, carendo non fruendo,[5] which if I might redeem by suffering all the torments that either tyrants have invented or martyrs suffered; if with my tongue I might lick out the print of my feet out of the way of sinners; if with tears of blood and water I might purge my uncleanness to work my redemption. Ecce Domine paratum aegrum haberes in omnem medicinam: "Behold, O Lord, thou shouldest have a patient fit for any cure." I would wring my drained eyes, ut facile sentires paratum ad omne supplicium ipsum habitum orantis Christiani.[6] But since my glass is run, and my sun set; since death hath overshadowed me, and that there is no pleading after sentence; since that sero ducit suspiria, qui non expectat remedium;[7] since my affecting what I should have desired is turned into a feeling of that I lost, quia ex inferno nulla redemptio quia poenarum nullus finis, suppliciorum nulla defectio, "because there is no end for my hell nor satisfaction for my punishment"; therefore to you I call, to you that careless live, that feel not with what sense I speak. Consider, whence you came, where you are, and whither you go. You are parts of that God that created all things for you and you for himself. You live on the stage of the earth, ubi spectaculum facti estis Deo, angelis et hominibus, "where you are in the view of God, angels and men." And you are going, oh look to your going. Non est vitae momentum sine motu ad mortem: "There is no moving of life without a motion to death." You go and are always going to make your appearance before the tribunal seat of [1] Let every one … wickedness begun from Sir John Harington's translation of Ariosto's Orlando Furioso (1591), with the final two lines coming from Samuel Daniel (England's Parnassus, p. 265).

[2] whereof whence.

[3] dependeth hangs, is suspended.

[4] God is best … no riches render may conflation of lines from Robert Southwell's "Loss in Delays" with a paraphrase of Spenser's Faerie Queene IV.ix.14.

[5] carendo non fruendo Latin, "in deprivation, not enjoyment."

[6] ut facile … orantis Christiani Latin, "so that you may more easily discern, prepared for any supplication, the character of a praying Christian."

[7] sero ducit … non expectat remedium Latin, "he draws breath too late who does not expect remedy."

God, where every man shall receive according to his works. Qualis vita, finis ita: ut cecideris, ita eris,[1] as you fall, so he finds you; as he finds you, so he censures you; as he censures you, so he leaves you for ever and ever. Wherefore quia arbor ad eam partem moriens cadit, ad quam partem vivens ramos extenderat, "because as a tree falls that way it sways while it is in growing," if you desire to fall right, learn while you are in your growth to sway the right way. Judge yourselves, that you be not judged: ut sementem feceris, ita metes, "what you sow that you reap," either a crown of glory, quam nemo scit nisi qui accepit, or a chaos of confusion, in qua sempiternus horror habitat, "whose worth cannot be expressed, but of him that enjoys it," or a mass of confusion "in which eternal horror doth inhabit."

Chapter V
A Sinner's Glass.

What is the life of man but a continual battle and defiance with God? What have our eyes and ears been, but open gates to send in loads of sin into our mind? What have our powers and senses been, but tinder to take and fuel to feed the flame of concupiscence?[2] What hath the body been but a stews[3] of an adulteress, but a forge of Satan, where the fire of our affections, kindled with wicked suggestions, have enflamed the passions of our heart and made it the anvil[4] to turn us to most ugly shapes of deformed sensuality? What hath our soul, which is the receipt[5] of the blessed Trinity, betrothed to Christ in Baptism, beautified with grace, ordained with the fellowship of angels to eternal bliss, what hath it been, but a most vile broker, presenting to the will allurements of sin? What hath our will been, but a common harlot lusting after every delight, wherein she took liking? What is our memory, but a register of most detestable and abominable facts committed by us? What hath our reason been, but a captived vagabond, subdued by every passion?

> The sin that conquers grace by wicked ure,[6]
> So soils our souls as they can have no cure.[7]

So that by this metamorphosis we are become more odious to God than the Devil himself, for the Devil by creation was more beautiful than we. It was sin that deformed him, and that sin that made him odious makes us detestable, for our sins are worse than his and we not so good as he, for his sin was one and ours are infinite. He sinned before the stipend of sin was known, ours after notice and experience of it. He sinned created in innocency; we sin restored unto it. He persisted in malice, being of God rejected; we continue in hatred against him that recalled us. His heart was hardened against him that punished him, ours obdurate[8] against him that allureth us, so that our case is now such as infinite goodness detesteth and infinite love cannot condole.[9] The earth was created for a place of pleasure, the air was created temperate, creatures were made to be obedient to man, all things framed to his best content. But see how sin hath transformed pleasure into plagues, famine and murders many in number, grievous in quality, and ordinary in experience, which indeed are but initia doloris,[10] for the damned suffer death without death, decay without decay, envy without envy, for their death ever liveth, their end ever beginneth, and their decay never ceaseth, but are always healed to be new wounded, dying but never dead, repaired only to be anew decayed.

---

[1] Qualis vita, finis ita Latin proverb, "As is the life, so is the end"; ut cecideris, ita eris Latin, "as you fall, so you will be [found]."

[2] concupiscence (sexual) desire, appetite.

[3] stews brothel.

[4] anvil block (usually of iron) on which the smith hammers and shapes the metal which he is working.

[5] receipt receptacle.

[6] ure use.

[7] The sin that conquers grace … have no cure paraphrase of John Higgins, ed. A Mirror for Magistrates (1574), found in England's Parnassus (p. 265).

[8] obdurate hardened, unyielding.

[9] condole sympathize.

[10] initia doloris Latin, "the beginnings of afflictions."

Chapter XIII
Evening Meditation

Odes in Imitation of the Seven Penitential Psalms, in Seven Several Kind of Verse.

Domine exaudi orationem meam[1]

Vouchsafe[2] admit thy gracious ears
With mild regard for to attend
The prayers that a plaining heart
With sorrowing sighs to thee doth send.
  And let thereto, O loving Lord,
  Thy justice and thy truth accord.

In rigour of thy righteous doom,
Oh, do not scan thy servant's cause,
For there is none on earth alive,
Through faultless life freed from thy laws:
  Then how may I in sinful plight
  Seem just in thy all-seeing sight?

The friend of sin, the foe of souls,
Down to the earth my soul hath brought,
Which to the Heaven should aspire,
Since from the Heaven it was wrought.
  Oh, raise it up again to bliss,
  From earth and all that earthly is.

Amidst the dark misled am I,
Where lack of light sin's view denies.
I live a life more like to death,
While dead from grace my body lies,
  And whereas care through secret smart
  Sends anguish to afflict my heart.

But I (O Lord) recall to mind
What thou hast done in time before,
And how thy justice hath been great,
But how thy mercy hath been more.
  Thus hope of help still comfort gives,
  While mercy still with justice lives.

My stretched hands to thee display
The ensigns of my yielding heart:
My soul, as earth that water wants,
Of virtue's fruit can bear no part.
  I faint, send some relief of rain,
  Lest else unfruitful I remain.

Thy face of pity, not of wrath,
Turn not, O loving Lord, from me,
And let not, Lord, mine own misdeeds
Have lasting force to anger thee:
  For so might I compare my case
  To theirs that furthest fall from grace.

But since my hope is firm in thee,
Let me betimes thy mercy have,
The way of health make known to me,
My feet from erring paths to save.
  Only to thee my soul retires;
  Only thy mercy it desires.

Oh, free me from my sinful foes,
To thee I fly to be secure,
Teach me the lesson of thy will,
And let me put it well in ure.[3]
  Thou art my God, and God of all
  That for thy aid and comfort call.

Thou wilt vouchsafe to me, O Lord,
Thy holy spirit to be my guide,
My faith and hope in thee is such,
And such it ever shall abide.
  Revive thou wilt me for thy name;
  Goodness in thee requires the same.

So that at last by thee, O God,
My soul from bale[4] to bliss be brought;
And that in mercy thou subvert

[1] Domine exaudi orationem meam Latin, "Lord, hear my prayer" (Psalm 102). The seven penitential psalms are 6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, and 143.

[2] Vouchsafe grant, promise.

[3] ure use.

[4] bale woe.

All those my soul's destruction sought;
And force of foes destroyed may be
And I made safe for serving thee.

All glory be to thee, O God,
The Father of eternal might,
And to the Son and Holy Ghost,
Three in an undivided plight,[1]
As now it is and was of yore,
And shall endure for evermore.

—1604

[1] plight condition, state.

Online Resources: Additional Texts and Suggested Reading

Like probably all editors of sixteenth-century literature anthologies, we found that the rich variety of this period's writing could not be contained even within the generous length of this volume. The reader will find at the end of the list of textual selections a second list of additional online texts, which can be found at the following site hosted by Broadview Press:

<http://sites.broadviewpress.com/16cpoetryprose>.

Some of these online texts provide readers with additional examples of genres that are of particular significance to sixteenth-century England's cultural, religious, and literary milieus: the sonnet sequence (George Chapman's "A Coronet for His Mistress Philosophy" [1595]), the translation (selections from Arthur Golding's translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses [1567] and John Florio's translation of Montaigne's Essays [1603], along with Florio's "Preface" discussing the reputation, nature, and process of translation), the popular murder narrative (Sundry Strange and Inhuman Murders [1591]), the sermon ("An Exhortation Concerning Good Order and Obedience to Rulers and Magistrates" in Certain Sermons or Homilies [1547]), as well as the broadside and ballad. Other online texts offer additional selections from works already excerpted in the print anthology, such as Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590, 1596) and William Harrison's Historical Description of the Island of Britain (1587).

The print anthology's online component also allows us to include some of the less-readily-available texts of both canonical and non-canonical figures. The print anthology, for example, contains selections from Thomas Lodge's relatively well-known pastoral romance Rosalind (1590), a source for Shakespeare's As You Like It, but readers can turn to the online texts and find selections from Lodge's historical romance Robin the Devil (1591), his fictionalized biography of William fitz Osbert (d. 1196) in The Life and Death of William Longbeard (1593), and his Ovidian verse narrative Scylla's Metamorphosis (1589); the print anthology contains selections from Sir Walter Ralegh's poetry, while the online texts contain selections from his account of the destruction of the Revenge during a battle with the Spanish (1591); and the print edition contains selections from the epigrams and philosophical poetry of John Davies, while the online texts offer excerpts from his Orchestra, or, a Poem of Dancing (1596).

Some online texts are provided specifically to help complicate or counter a particular writer's present reputation: thus, the online selections include dedicatory letters by the strident reformist polemicist John Bale, urging the King to protect what remains of England's textual heritage; although Bale had fully supported the dissolution of the monasteries as part of the destruction of the English Roman Catholic Church, his dedicatory letters to John Leyland's Laborious Journey (1549) battle one of the unforeseen results of this act: the scattering and sometimes wholesale destruction of the books and manuscripts in monastery libraries. Likewise, the online text "The Mathematical Preface" (in Euclid's Elements [1570]) by John Dee shows Dee's systematic knowledge of mathematics in both its abstract and practical guises. Recommending the translation of classical works of science as a method of encouraging scientific and mathematical literacy in England, Dee shows himself a more complex figure than his continued popular reputation as magician and conjuror would suggest.

The "Suggested Reading" contains both critical works on sixteenth-century literature, as well as a list of modern editions of the works selected in our anthology.

Index of Authors, Titles, and First Lines

Achilles' Shield, 1188
Ad Musam (Epigram 1), 1138
Ad Musam (Epigram 48), 1143
The Adventures of Master F.J., 341
An Act against Conjurations, Enchantments, and Witchcrafts, 571
Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days, 220, 228
The Affectionate Shepherd, Containing the Complaint of Daphnis for the Love of Ganymede, 760
After so long a race as I have run, 808
Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see, 685
Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss, 195
Alas, so all things now do hold their peace, 190
All my senses, like beacons' flame, 672
All were too little for the merchant's hand, 367
Amongst the poets Dacus numbered is, 1140
Among the rest by Fortune overthrown, 299
Amoretti, 803
Amphiôn's wife was turned to rock. Oh, 607
The ancient time commended, not for naught, 201
And call ye this to utter what is just, 753
And every year a world my will did deem, 366
And grant I may so vively put in verse, 598
And if I did what then?, 362
And now she begins to see, 307
And then not daring with presuming eye, 215
ANGER, JANE, 608
An Answer to Comfort Her, by Showing His Haps to Be Harder, 388
Aprill [Eclogue], 785
As an unperfect actor on the stage, 1081
ASCHAM, ROGER, 332
As I in hoary winter's night, 1108
ASKEW, ANNE, 138
Ask nothing of thy neighbour that, 383
As on the wings of your enchanting fame, 597
As some men say there is a kind of seed, 358
As the sweet seat of roses in a still, 1202
Astrophil and Stella, 677
As when the bright cerulean firmament, 1145
The Author [...] Maketh Her Will and Testament, 390
The author (though loath to leave the city) upon, 390
The Author to His Loving Cousin, 1101
The Author to the Reader [Whitney], 379
Away thou fondling motley humourist, 1198
Ay me, to whom shall I my case complain, 745

BACON, ANNE COOKE, 169
BACON, FRANCIS, VISCOUNT ST ALBAN, 1154
The Bait, 1196
BALDWIN, WILLIAM, 235
The Ballad Which Anne Askew Made, 159
Barnabe Riche His Farewell to Military Profession, 487
BARNFIELD, RICHARD, 759
Basilikon Doron, or His Majesty's Instructions to His Dearest Son, Henry the Prince, 601
Beauty shut up thy shop, and truss up all thy trash, 354
Because I oft, in dark abstracted guise, 679
Because I to my brethren wrote, 387
Before mine eye to feed my greedy will, 366
Behold the father is his daughter's son, 1107
Behold this fleeting world, how all things fade, 425
Be nought dismayd that her unmoved mind, 804
Beware the Cat, 237
The bitter force of Fortune's frowardness, 389
Blame Not My Lute, 204
Blame not my lute, for he must sound, 204
A blithe and bonny country lass, 989
The Bloody Marriage, or Butcherly Murder of the Admiral of France, 619
The Book Named the Governor, 129
A Book of Ayres, 1271
The Book of the Courtier, 309
Bright-footed Thetis did the sphere aspire, 1190
Bright star of beauty, fairest fair alive, 773
The Burning Babe, 1108
But mercy, Lord, O Lord some pity take, 216
But mercy while I found with shrieking cry, 214
But now my Muse toiled with continual care, 776
But render me my wonted joys again, 218
By rig'rous fate tho' learned, pious, fair, 668

Caelica, Containing CIX Sonnets, 671
The Calm, 1205
CAMPION, THOMAS, 1270
A Careful Complaint by the Unfortunate Author [Whitney], 388
CHAPMAN, GEORGE, 1163
Chara in valeto soror, in coelo morte triumphas, 668

Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape, 776
The Chichester Monster, 560
Christ's Bloody Sweat, 1106
Chronicles: England, Scotland, and Ireland, 515
Colin my deare, when shall it please thee sing, 797
Come live with me and be my love, 1196
Come, Madam, come, all rest my powers defy, 1203
Coming Homeward out of Spain, 427
Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found), 806
The common speech is, spend and God will send, 364
A Communication Which the Author Had to London, 390
Comparison of Life and Death, 199
A Complaint by Night of the Lover Not Beloved, 190
Complaint of a Lover Rebuked, 190
The Complaint of Rosamond, 948
Complaint of the Absence of Her Lover Being upon the Sea, 192
COOKE, ANNE. See BACON, ANNE COOKE
Corydon's Song, 989
The Countess of Pembroke's Arcadia, 687
A country lass brown as a berry, 1048
The Courtier's Life, 197
Cuddie, for shame hold up thy heavye head, 791
The curious wits, seeing dull pensiveness, 678
Cynthia. With Certain Sonnets, and the Legend of Cassandra, 772

Daemonology, 579
DANIEL, SAMUEL, 945
DAVIES, JOHN, 1137
The day is very near at hand, 1249
Decease Release, 1108
Deceiving world, that with alluring toys, 1033
DEE, JOHN, 405
The Defence of Poesy, 713
A Defence of Rhyme, 964
De Guiana, Carmen Epicum, 1184
Delia, 945
DELONEY, THOMAS, 1238
Description and Praise of His Love Geraldine, 190
Description of a Gun, 196
Description of Spring, 189
Description of the Contrarious Passions in a Lover, 194
Description of Virtue, 201
DE VERE, ANNE CECIL, COUNTESS OF OXFORD, 605
A Devout Treatise upon the Pater Noster, 80
Dialogue between Two Shepherds, Thenot and Piers, in Praise of Astraea, 749
Diana (on a time) walking the wood, 774
The Diary of Lady Margaret Hoby, 939
The Diary of Richard Rogers, 441
Disanchored from a blissful shore, 1106
The Discovery of Guiana, 1120
The Discovery of Witchcraft, 577
A Disputation between a He Cony-Catcher and a She Cony-Catcher, 1011
Divine Camenes, that with your sacred food, 425
The Doleful Lay of Clorinda, 745
Do never think it strange, 234
DONNE, JOHN, 1194
The Doubt of Future Foes, 401
DOWRICHE, ANNE, 616
DRAYTON, MICHAEL, 1090

Early before the day doth spring, 1151
The Earth, from heavenly light conceived heat, 1167
Eclogues, Epitaphs, and Sonnets, 424
Eiusdem ad Lectorem de Authore, 615
Elegy 1: Jealousy, 1202
Elegy 8: The Comparison, 1202
Elegy 19: To His Mistress Going to Bed, 1203
Elizabethae in Obitum Katharinae Sororis Epicaedia, 668
ELIZABETH I, QUEEN OF ENGLAND, 399
ELYOT, SIR THOMAS, 129
England's Heroical Epistles, 1095
Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir, 307
Envy go weep, my Muse and I, 1153
Epigrams and Elegies, 1138
An Epitaph of the Death of Nicholas Grimald, 425
Epithalamion, 808
Essays, 1156
The Essays of a Prentice, 598
Eternal virgin, goddess true, 1151
Et maintenant elle commence à voir, 307
Eupheus: The Anatomy of Wit, 459
Even as her state, so is her mind, 1153
Even as the sun with purple-coloured face, 1059
Evening Meditation, 1285
Even Now That Care, 746
Even now that care which on thy crown attends, 746
Ever well affected will, 1152
The Examination and Confession of Certain Witches at Chelmsford, 573
The Examination, Confession, and Condemnation of Henry Robson, 553
Examine not th'inscrutable heart, 1152
Exiled Astraea is come again, 1152
Eye of that mind most quick and clear, 1151

The Faerie Queene, 818
Fair Bersabe the bright once bathing in a well, 345
Fair is my love, and cruel as sh'is fair, 946
Fair lovely lady, whose angelic eyes, 760
Faith (wench) I cannot court thy sprightly eyes, 1144
The famous warriors of the anticke world, 807
Fancy (quoth he) farewell, whose badge I long did bear, 373
Farewell, thou art too dear for my possessing, 1084
Farewell, thou fertile soil that Brutus first out found, 426
A Farewell to the Reader [Whitney], 384
Fat soil, full spring, sweet olive, grape of bliss, 1106
Fayre ye be sure, but cruell and unkind, 806
A Fig for Momus, 991
The fine youth Ciprius is more terse and neat, 1140
The First Blast of the Trumpet against the Monstrous Regiment of Women, 205
The First Examination of Anne Askew, 139
First shall the heavens want starry light, 979
The Flea, 1197
Fly, merry Muse, unto that merry town, 1138
Fond woman, which wouldst have thy husband die, 1202
For lo, in sin, Lord, I begotten was, 216
For mercy, Lord, with one accord, 563
The forward violet thus did I chide, 1085
For why? the gains doth seldom quit the charge, 367
Four Epitaphs Made by the Countess of Oxenford after the Death of Her Young Son, 605
Fourteen Sermons of Bernardine Ochine, 174
FOXE, JOHN, 220, 228
Foxe's Book of Martyrs. See Acts and Monuments of These Latter and Perilous Days
The French History, 617
Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king, 807
Friend Googe, give me the faithful friend to trust, 427
Friend Is., be now content and let my sorrows quell, 388
From Fortune's Reach, 1105
From Tuscan came my lady's worthy race, 190
The furious gun, in his most raging ire, 195

GASCOIGNE, GEORGE, 339
Gascoigne's Good Morrow, 368
Gascoigne's Good Night, 369
Gascoigne's Lullaby, 363
Gascoigne's Woodmanship, 370
General and Rare Memorials Pertaining to the Perfect Art of Navigation, 406
Geron, whose mouldy memory corrects, 1139
Give money me, take friendship whoso list, 426
Go and catch a falling star, 1196
God gives not kings the style of gods in vain, 601
The gods most just do justly punish sin, 610
Goe little booke: thy selfe present, 778
Going towards Spain, 426
The Golden Speech, 403
GOLDING, ARTHUR, 538n3
Gold savours well, though it be got, 383
Go, my flock, go get you hence, 684
Good, aged Bale, that with thy hoary hairs, 425
Good brother Brooke, I often look, 385
Good brother Philip, I have borne you long, 681
Good brother when a vacant time, 385
Good Dido, stint thy tears, 388
Good reader, now you tasted have, 384
Good sisters mine, when I, 386
GOOGE, BARNABE, 423
Go, soul, the body's guest, 1111
GOSSON, STEPHEN, 446
Grant thou me mercy, Lord; thee, thee alone, 216
GREENE, ROBERT, 996
Greene's Groatsworth of Wit, Bought with a Million of Repentance, 1027
The Green Knight's Farewell to Fancy, 373
GREVILLE, FULKE, FIRST BARON BROOKE OF BEAUCHAMPS COURT, 670
GREY, LADY JANE, 226
GRYMESTON, ELIZABETH, 1277
Gulling Sonnets, 1144

Had with morning the gods left their wills undone, 605
HAKLUYT, RICHARD, 639
A Handful of Wholesome (Though Homely) Herbs, 455
Happy is the prince that hath in wealth the grace, 281
Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands, 803
HARRISON, WILLIAM, 527
A hasty tongue, which runs at large, 383
Have mercy, God, for thy great mercy's sake, 215
Have mercy, Lord, have mercy, for I know, 216
The heavens, death, and life have conjured my ill, 606
The heinous guilt of my forsaken ghost, 214
HERBERT, MARY SIDNEY, COUNTESS OF PEMBROKE, 743
Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheveril glove), 775
Here my chameleon Muse herself doth change, 1144
Hero and Leander, 1213
He was a man not over spare, 1050
Heywood, which did in epigrams excel, 1140
His being was in her alone, 707
An Historical Description of the Island of Britain, 528

HOBY, MARGARET, 938
HOBY, THOMAS, 309
HOLINSHED, RAPHAEL, 513
Homer of moly and nepenthe sings, 1141
Homer's Iliad (Book 18), 1190
How by a Kiss He Found Both His Life and Death, 196
How Each Thing, Save the Lover, in Spring Reviveth to Pleasure, 191
How Jack Cade Traitorously Rebelling against His King Was [...] Worthily Punished, 284
How King Richard II Was for His Evil Governance Deposed, 281
How oft when thou, my music, music play'st, 1086
A Hundred Merry Tales, 583
A Hundred Sundry Flowers, 340
Hymns of Astraea, in Acrostic Verse, 1151

I care not for these ladies, 1271
Idall for Adon nev'r shed so many tears, 606
Idea's Mirror, 1093
I.D. of the Middle Temple, 1165
If all the world and love were young, 1113
If God do help thee, 234
I find no peace, and all my war is done, 194
If once the heat did sore thee beat, 614
If that a loyal heart and faith unfeigned, 946
If that thou minded are to give, 383
If the dull substance of my flesh were thought, 1083
If this be love, to draw a weary breath, 946
If thou survive my well-contented day, 1082
I grieve, and dare not show my discontent, 401
I love thee not for sacred chastity, 1143
In a grove most rich of shade, 682
In Ciprium (Epigram 22), 1140
In court to serve, decked with fresh array, 197
In Dacum (Epigram 30), 1140
In doleful ways I spend the wealth of my time, 606
The Induction, 291
In Gerontem (Epigram 20), 1139
In haste post haste when first my wand'ring mind, 366
In Haywodum (Epigram 29), 1140
In his hands and in his full power, 307
In martial sports I had my cunning tried, 679
In night when colours all to black are cast, 673
In Philonem (Epigram 38), 1142
In Rufum (Epigram 3), 1138
In Severum (Epigram 13), 1139
The Instruction of a Christian Woman, 96
In that same month wherein the spring begins, 992
In Titum (Epigram 6), 1139
I once may see when years shall wreck my wrong, 947
I pray thee, nymph, by all the working words, 982
I see the house; my heart, thy self contain, 681
I sing divine Astraea's praise, 749
The Isle of Wight Monster, 563
It fell on a summer's day, 1272
It glorious is to give all things, 383
It is most true, that eyes are formed to serve, 677
It is most true that God to Israel, 755
I whole in body, and in mind, 391
I with whose colours Myra dressed her head, 671
I yield myself, I offer up my ghost, 219

JAMES VI, KING OF SCOTLAND, 579, 597
Jane Anger, Her Protection for Women, 608
Jane Lumley's Commonplace Book, 181
Januarye [Eclogue], 782
John Dee's Actions with Spirits, 412
Joy of my life, full oft for loving you, 808
The juice of all these flowers take, 384

Keep well thy tongue and keep thy friend, 383
KEMP, WILLIAM, 1041
Kempe's Nine Days Wonder, 1042
Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids, 1200
KNOX, JOHN, 205

The labour sweet that I sustained in thee, 426
The Lady Jane Grey to the Lord Gilford Dudley, 1095
A Lamentation for the Death of Mrs. K. Killigrew, 668
The Lamentation of a Gentlewoman upon the Death of Her Late Deceased Friend, 395
The Lamentation of a Sinner, 164
LATIMER, HUGH, 111
The Latter Examination of Anne Askew, 151
Launch forth my soul into a main of tears, 1102
Let fickle fortune run her blindest race, 1105
Let me not to the marriage of true minds, 1086
Letter, Lady Jane Grey to Her Father, 227
Letter, Margaret Roper to the Most Learned Theologian, Des. Erasmus Roterodamus, S.P.D., 85
Letter to Lord Burghley [from Frances Bacon], 1155
Letter to Mary [from Queen Katherine Parr], 167
Letter to Our Most Noble and Virtuous Queen Katherine, Elizabeth her humble daughter, 399
The Lie, 1111
The life is long that loathsomely doth last, 199
The Life of Sir Thomas More, 87
Like as the armed knight, 159
A little gold in law will make, 383

The little love-god, lying once asleep, 1089
Lo, as a careful housewife runs to catch, 1088
LOCKE [LOK], ANNE (VAUGHAN), 210
LODGE, THOMAS, 969
Lo here the glory of a greater day, 960
Lo I the man, whose Muse whilome did maske, 821
The longer life, the more offence, 199
Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds, 217
Long have I longed to see my love again, 776
The Long Love, 203
The long love that in my thought doth harbour, 203
The long love that in my thought I harbour, 194
Long-while I sought to what I might compare, 804
Look in thy glass and tell the face thou viewest, 1079
Look on me, Lord, though trembling I beknow, 217
Lo, prostrate, Lord, before thy face I lie, 217
The Lord Gilford Dudley to the Lady Jane Grey, 1098
Lord, of thy mercy if thou me withdraw, 218
Lo straining cramp of cold despair again, 218
Love in my bosom like a bee, 975
Love is too young to know what conscience is, 1089
The Lover Compareth His Heart to the Overcharged Gun, 195
The Lover Compareth His State to a Ship in a Perilous Storm Tossed on the Sea, 194
The Lover Complaineth the Unkindness of His Love, 195
The Lover Forsaken of Her Lover Prayeth His Return or the End of Her Own Life, 200
The Lover for Shamefastness Hideth His Desire within His Faithful Heart, 194
The Lover Laments the Death of His Love, 196
The Lover Showeth How He Is Forsaken of Such as He Sometime Enjoyed, 195
Love that liveth and reigneth in my thought, 190
Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show, 677
LUMLEY, LADY JANE (or JOANNA), 180
Lyke as a huntsman after weary chase, 806
Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde, 805
Lyke as the Culver on the bared bough, 808
LYLY, JOHN, 458

The Maidstone Monster, 568
Man, dream no more of curious mysteries, 673
The Manner of Her Will, and What She Left to London, 391
Marching among the woods of fine delight, 382
Mark but this flea, and mark in this, 1197
MARLOWE, CHRISTOPHER, 1213
MARSTON, JOHN, 1209
Martial, the things that do attain, 193
Master Kemp His Welcome to Norwich, 1052
The Means to Attain Happy Life, 193
A Meditation of a Penitent Sinner, 214
Meditations of a Gull (Epigram 47), 1142
Merry Tales [...] Made by Master Skelton, Poet Laureate, 590
Merry Tales, Witty Questions and Quick Answers, 588
Methought I saw the grave, where Laura lay, 1111
Mine own dear lord, sith thou art locked from me, 1095
Mine own John Poins, since ye delight to know, 197
A Mirror for Magistrates, 277
The Mirror of Mirth, 591
The Mirror of Princely Deeds and Knighthood, 429
Miscellanea. Meditations. Memoratives, 1278
MORE, THOMAS, 10
Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day, 807
Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade, 807
The Much Horkesley Monster, 557
The Murder of George Saunders, 538
The Murder of John Brewen, 549
My case is this: I love Zepheria bright, 1145
My galley charged with forgetfulness, 194
My heart imprisoned in a hopeless isle, 1093
My heart indicts an argument of worth, 750
My heart the anvil where my thoughts do beat, 1094
My love hath vowed he will forsake me, 1272
My love is as a fever, longing still, 1089
My love is strengthened, though more weak in seeming, 1086
My lute awake, perform the last, 195
My many sins in number are increased, 215
My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun, 1087
My son is gone, and with it death end my sorrow, 607
My worthy lord, I pray you wonder not, 370

NASHE, THOMAS, 927
The Nativity of Christ, 1107
Nature that gave the bee so feat a grace, 196
Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk, 1119
Next morning when the golden sun was risen, 766
No crooked leg, no bleared eye, 400
"No haste but good," where wisdom makes the way, 367
No longer mourn for me when I am dead, 1083
Nosce Teipsum, 1146
Not marble nor the gilded monuments, 1083
November [Eclogue], 797
Now have you heard before, of faggot, fire, and sword, 619
Now thou hast loved me one whole day, 1197
Nymph of the garden where all beauties be, 681
The Nymph's Reply to the Shepherd, 1113

O all you lands the treasures of your joy, 757
Observations in the Art of English Poesy, 1273
The Ocean to Cynthia, 1114
October [Eclogue], 791
O Dieux ayez de moy compassion, 306
Of a New Married Student That Played Fast and Loose, 200
Of Astraea (Hymn I), 1151
O fate, O fault, O curse, child of my bliss, 685
Of Edwards of the Chapel, 425
Of Her Justice (Hymn XXIII), 1152
Of Her Magnanimity (Hymn XXIV), 1153
Of Her Will (Hymn XVI), 1152
Of Her Wit (Hymn II), 1151
Of Human Knowledge, 1147
Of Money, 426
O Fortune, thy wresting, wavering state, 400
Of the Courtier's Life, Written to John Poins, 197
Of the Passions of Her Heart (Hymn XX), 1152
Of the Same [Of the Death of Sir T.W.], 193
Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay, 806
Of Tobacco (Epigram 36), 1141
Of wicked men to be dispraised, 384
O God, God of my health, my saving God, 218
O gods, have of me compassion, 306
O grammar rules, O now your virtues show, 680
O happy dames that may embrace, 192
O kiss, which dost those ruddy gems impart, 680
O Lord in me there lieth nought, 757
O Lord, whose grace no limits comprehend, 752
One day as I unwarily did gaze, 805
One day I wrote her name upon the strand, 808
On Hellespont, guilty of true love's blood, 1213
Only joy, now here you are, 682
Only that eye which for true love doth weep, 1163
On Monsieur's Departure, 401
O Petrarch, head and prince of poets all, 200
O raging seas and mighty Neptune's reign, 427
An Order Prescribed, By Is. W. To Two of Her Younger Sisters Serving in London, 386
Or I shall live your epitaph to make, 1084
Others of the Four Last Lines, of Other That She Made Also, 607
The other two, slight air and purging fire, 1083
Our storm is past, and that storm's tyrannous rage, 1205
Out from the horror of infernal deeps, 948
Ovid's Banquet of Sense, 1164

A Panegyric Congratulatory to the King's Most Excellent Majesty, 960
PARR, KATHERINE, QUEEN OF ENGLAND, 161
Peace, idle Muse, have done! for it is time, 1143
Philo the gentleman, the fortune teller, 1142
The pillar perished is whereto I lent, 196
Plays Confuted in Five Actions, 449
Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth, 1088
The Posies of George Gascoigne, 373
The pounded spice both taste and scent doth please, 1108
Praise of Measure-Keeping, 201
A Praise of Petrarch and of Laura His Lady, 200
Prayers or Meditations, 162
Prisoned in Windsor, He Recounteth His Pleasure There Passed, 191
The Prodigal Child's Soul Wrack, 1106
Psalm 45: Eructavit cor meum, 750
Psalm 49: Audite haec omnes, 751
Psalm 51: Miserere mei Deus, 752
Psalm 57: Miserere mei Deus, 753
Psalm 58: Si vere utique, 753
Psalm 72: Deus Judicium, 754
Psalm 73: Quam bonus Israel, 755
Psalm 82: Deus stetit, 756
Psalm 100: Jubilate Deo, 757
Psalm 139: Domine probasti, 757
Psalms, 750
The Puritan Severus oft doth read, 1139

The Queen's Visiting of the Camp at Tilsbury with Her Entertainment There, 1239
Queen Virtue's court, which some call Stella's face, 678
A Quip for an Upstart Courtier, 997

RALEGH (OR RALEIGH), SIR WALTER, 1110
The Relic, 1198
A Reply to the Same [Whitney], 389
Restore thy tresses to the golden ore, 946
The Retitled and Revised Introduction and Conclusion of The Adventures of Master F.J., 375
RICHE, BARNABE, 486
A ripe engine, a quick and wakened wit, 598
ROGERS, RICHARD, 440
ROPER, MARGARET MORE, 79
ROPER, WILLIAM, 86
Rosalind, 970
Rosalind's Madrigal, 975
Rowland for shame awake thy drowsy muse, 1090
The Ruffs Monster, 565
Rufus, the courtier, at the theatre, 1138

RUSSELL, ELIZABETH COOKE HOBY, 666

The sacred Muse that first made love divine, 1145
Saint Peter's Complaint, 1102
Sappho to Philaenis, 1208
Satire I, 1198
Satire III, 1200
Satyre X: Humours, 1209
Say that thou didst forsake me for some fault, 1084
Scarce had the morning star hid from the light, 760
The Schoolmaster, 332
The School of Abuse, 446
SCOTT, REGINALD, 577
The Scourge of Villainy, 1209
The Second Day's Lamentation of the Affectionate Shepherd, 766
The Second Volume of the Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffiques and Discoveries, 640
Seek not each man to please, for that, 384
See yonder melancholy gentleman, 1142
Selected Correspondence between Sir Philip Sidney and Edmund Molyneux, 739
Selected Correspondence of Lady Mary Sidney to Edmund Molyneux, 740
Selected Letters (Anne Cooke Bacon), 175
Selected Speeches (Elizabeth I), 402
The Sequence on the Virgin Mary and Christ, 1107
Sermon on the Ploughers, 113
Sermons of Barnardine Ochine of Sena, 171
Sermons of John Calvin, Upon the Song that Hezekiah Made, 211
Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green, 191
SHAKESPEARE, WILLIAM, 1058
Shall I call it fortune or my froward folly, 284
Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?, 1080
A Shepeheards boye (no better doe him call), 782
The Shepheardes Calender, 778
The Shepherds' Garland, 1090
Shore's Wife, 299
Show mercy, Lord, not unto me alone, 219
SIDNEY, SIR PHILIP, 676
Sighs are my food, my drink are my tears, 197
Sighing and sadly sitting by my love, 775
Sin and despair have so possessed my heart, 217
Since Ovid (love's first gentle master) died, 1166
Sing lullaby, as women do, 363
Sion lies waste, and thy Jerusalem, 674
Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls, 1206
Sir Walter Ralegh to His Son, 1113
SKELTON, JOHN, 1
Sleep grim Reproof, my jocund Muse doth sing, 1209
So cruel prison how could betide, alas, 191
So foul is sin and loathsome in thy sight, 215
So I, blind wretch, whom God's inflamed ire, 214
A sole thought that profits and injures me, 308
Some glory in their birth, some in their skill, 1085
Some talk of Ganymede th'Idalian boy, 775
Sometimes I wish that I his pillow were, 774
Some wits there be which like my method well, 1094
Song (Go and catch a falling star), 1196
Songs and Sonnets, 203
Songs and Sonnets Written by the Right Honourable Lord Henry Howard [...] and Others, 189
Sonnet Deciphering the Perfect Poet, 598
Sonnets, 1079
Sonnets to Bothwell, 306
Sonnet to Elizabeth, 308
The soote season, that bud and bloom forth brings, 189
SOUTHWELL, ROBERT, 1101
The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre, 804
SPENSER, EDMUND, 777
Sporting at fancy, setting light by love, 773
The stately dames of Rome their pearls did wear, 356
Stella, since thou so right a princess art, 686
The Storm, 1204
STOW, JOHN, 1226
STUART, MARY, QUEEN OF SCOTS, 306
A student at his book so placed, 200
Such poor folk as to law do go, 383
Sufficeth it to you, my joys interred, 1114
SURREY, HENRY HOWARD, EARL OF, 189
A Survey of London, 1228
Sweet coral lips, where nature's treasure lies, 773
Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere, 805
A Sweet Nosegay [...] Containing a Hundred and Ten Philosophical Flowers, 383
A Sweet Nosegay, or Pleasant Posy, 378
Sweet wench, I love thee, yet I will not sue, 1144

Take all my loves, my love, yea take them all, 1082
T.B. in Commendation of the Author, 382
Teach the king's son, who king himself shall be, 754
The Tears of an Affectionate Shepherd Sick for Love, 760
Tell me good Hobbinoll, what garres thee greete?, 785
Tell you I chyll, 1
That lawyer, which is chose to plead, 383
That Petrarch Cannot Be Surpassed, but Notwithstanding That Laura is Far Surpassed, 200
That Pleasure Is Mixed with Every Pain, 196

That self-same day, and of that day that hour, 354
That thou hast her, it is not all my grief, 1082
That time of year thou mayst in me behold, 1083
Then hate me when thou wilt, if ever, now, 1085
Then on thy hill, and in thy walled town, 219
These royal kings, that rear up to the sky, 310
Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame, 1087
They Flee from Me, 203
They flee from me that sometime did me seek, 195, 203
They that have pow'r to hurt, and will do none, 1085
The Third and Last Volume of the Voyages, Navigations, Traffiques, and Discoveries, 645
The Third Eclogue, 1090
This harvest time, I harvestless, 379
This holy season fit to fast and pray, 805
This horror when my trembling soul doth hear, 214
This little book, Beware the Cat, 237
This monstrous shape to thee, England, 570
This monstrous world that monsters breeds as rife, 557
This picture pressed in paper white, 567
Thomas of Reading, or, The Six Worthy Yeomen of the West, 1242
Those lips that Love's own hand did make, 1088
Thou canst not die whilst any zeal abound, 947
Though sharp the seed by Anger sowed, 615
Though virtue be the same when low she stands, 958
Thou lovest simple sooth, not hidden face, 216
Thou which art I, ('tis nothing to be so), 1204
Three things there be that prosper up apace, 1113
Thus from the strongest treble-walled tower, 1098
Thus was my love, thus was my Ganymed, 774
Thy mercies' praise, instead of sacrifice, 219
Thy mercy Lord, Lord now thy mercy show, 753
The time is come I must depart, 390
Titus, the brave and valorous young gallant, 1139
To Astraea (Hymn II), 1151
To Doctor Bale, 425
To Envy (Hymn XXVI), 1153
To Her Brother, B.W., 385
To Her Brother, G.W., 385
To Her Sister Mistress A.B., 387
To His Good Friend, Sir Anthony Cooke, 1144
To His Love Whom He had Kissed against Her Will, 195
To His Mistress, 773
To His Mistress A.L.: Epistle 3, 992
To love, alas, who would not fear, 200
To Master Googe's Fancy That Begins 'Give money me,' 427
To My Most Gracious Dread Sovereign, 1146
To prink me up and make me higher placed, 366
To Sir Henry Wotton, 1206
To that clear majesty which, in the north, 1146
To the Angel Spirit of the Most Excellent Sir Philip Sidney, 748
To thee pure spirit, to thee alone addressed, 748
To the Lady Anne Clifford, 959
To the Lady Lucy, Countess of Bedford, 958
To the Queen, 597
To the Right Excellent [...] the Lady Penelope Rich, 760
To the Right Noble [...] Sir Walter Raleigh [Letter to Ralegh], 818
To the Translation of Palingen, 426
To the Troops at Tilbury, 402
TOTTEL, RICHARD, 188
The Tragedy of Euripides Called Iphigenia, 182
Transform'd in show, but more transform'd in mind, 689
The True Law of Free Monarchies, 599
The Tunning of Elynour Rummyng, 1
The Turkish government allows no law, 673
Two eyes, two ears, and but one tongue, 383
Two loves I have of comfort and despair, 1088
Two suns at once from one fair heaven there shined, 973
Two worthy knights, and Hobys both by name, 667
TYLER, MARGARET, 428

Une seul penser qui me profite et nuit, 308
The Unfortunate Traveller, 927
Unhappy pen and ill-accepted papers, 947
Unthrifty loveliness, why dost thou spend, 1080
Unto the tender youth of those fair eyes, 959
Upon Consideration of the State of This Life, He Wisheth Death, 199
Utopia, 11

Venomous thorns that are so sharp, 196
Venus and Adonis, 1059
Verse on the Hoby Tombs at Bisham, 667
A Vision upon this Conceit of "The Faerie Queene," 1111
VIVES, JUAN LUIS, 96
Vouchsafe admit thy gracious ears, 1285
Vous la croyez, las! trop je l'apperçoy, 308
Vow to Love Faithfully Howsoever He Be Rewarded, 191
Vulcan begat me, Minerva me taught, 196

A Way of Reconciliation of a Good and Learned Man, 668
What eagle can behold her sunbright eye, 1145
What guyle is this, that those her golden tresses, 805
What, have I thus betrayed my liberty?, 679
What is the cause, why states, that war and win, 674
What meant the poets in invective verse, 1028

What one art thou, thus in torn weed yclad?, 201
What work of honour and eternal name, 1184
WHEATHILL, ANNE, 454
Whenas the wicked are in midst, 384
When first I ended, then I first began, 1094
When forty winters shall besiege thy brow, 1079
When God for sin to plague hath ment, 560
When I do count the clock that tells the time, 1080
When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes, 1081
When in the chronicle of wasted time, 1086
When I Was Fair and Young, 402
When I was fair and young, and favour graced me, 402
When I was forced from Stella, ever dear, 685
When my grave is broke up again, 1198
When my love swears that she is made of truth, 1087
When sorrow, using mine own fire's might, 686
When thou hast spent the ling'ring day in pleasure and delight, 369
When to her lute Corinna sings, 1272
When to the sessions of sweet silent thought, 1082
When Windsor walls sustained my wearied arm, 191
Where is that holy fire, which verse is said, 1208
Where poor men plead at princes' bar, 756
Whilst that thou hast free liberty, 383
WHITNEY, ISABELLA, 377
Whoever hath her wish, thou hast thy Will, 1087
Who givest wit to whales, to apes, to owls, 276
Whoso List to Hunt, 203
Whoso list to hunt, I know where is an hind, 203
Who will believe my verse in time to come, 1080
Who will in fairest book of nature know, 680
Why did my parents send me to the schools, 1147
Why do I speak of joy or write of love, 1094
Why is my verse so barren of new pride?, 1084
With her in arms that had my heart in hold, 361
Within the year of Christ our Lord, 1239
With Petrarch to compare there may no wight, 200
With poet's pen I do not press to write, 395
With sweet hyssop besprinkle thou my sprite, 217
Woman's Constancy, 1197
A woman's face with nature's own hand painted, 1081
The Wooing Eclogue Betwixt Rosalind and Rosader, 982
World-dwellers all give heed to what I say, 751
The wrathful winter proaching on apace, 291
Written in Her French Psalter, 400
Written on a Window Frame at Woodstock, 400
W With heart, and hand, among the rest, 1052
Wyatt Being in Prison, to Bryan, 197
WYATT, SIR THOMAS, 194, 203
W[yatt] resteth here that quick could never rest, 193

Ye learned sisters which have oftentimes, 808
Ye tradefull Merchants that with weary toyle, 804
You believe her (alas) I perceive it too well, 307
Your words, my friend, right healthful caustics, blame, 678
You that have spent the silent night, 368